OVCHINNIKOV VIEWS SECURITY ISSUES, PROCESS

PM101939 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 11 Mar 86 First Edition p 4

[Article by PRAVDA political observer Vsevolod Ovchinnikow: "Security in the Nuclear Age']

[Text] The 27th CPSU Congress decisions convincingly demonstrated the indivisibility of socialism and peace and the historical mission of the Land of the Soviets as the standardbearer of the forces called upon to deliver mankind from nuclear suicide.

Imperialism has not given up its obsession with perpetuating its domination and disregarding the progressive march of history. But nuclear confrontation imposes new forms of mutual relations between states and social systems. A dangerous gulf has arisen between the realities of the age and the stereotypes of political thinking. The treat of the destruction of all living things awakens in manking the forces of self-preservation and creates favorable preconditions for constructive, creative collaboration among countries and peoples on a plant-wide scale. The combination of the historical confrontation between the two systems and the growing interdependence of the states of the world community is a manifestation of the dialectics of present-day world development. Objective conditions have arisen in the international arena in which the confrontation between capitalism and socialism can only, exclusively take the forms of peaceful competition and peaceful revalry.

"The nuclear danger has equalized states in one respect: In a major war nobody can stand on the sidelines or warm his hands at someone else's misfortune," M.S. Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, said in his speech at the closing of the congress. "Identical security is an imperious command of the times. Ensuring that security is increasingly becoming a political task which can be resolved only by political means. It is time to build relations between states on a more lasting foundation than that of weapons."

The modern world has become too fragile for strong-arm policies. It can only be saved and preserved by breaking with the age-old ideas of the acceptability and permissibility of wars and armed conflicts. The nuclear age makes us rethink the very philosophy of politics. Whereas before, a win for one side usually meant a defeat for the other, today security for the USSR and the United States can only be mutual; and for international relations in general, it can only be universal. It cannot be ensured at the expense of or too the detriment of the other side.

Nor can you eternally go on building security on the fear of retribution. The doctrines of "restraint" or "deterrence" not only make the entire world the captive of chance, but encourage the arms race, which could sooner or later get out of control. The present level of military confrontation only guarantees each side equal danger, but if it is raised even higher, parity itself will cease to be a restraining factor. True equal security is guaranteed in our age not by an extremely high level, but by an extremely low level of the strategic balance, from which it is necessary entirely to exclude nuclear and other types of weapons of mass destruction.

The mutual commitment adopted by the USSR and U.S. leaders at the Geneva meeting not to seek military superiority meets the interests of both states' security. Conversely, any attempt to wreck the strategic parity is fraught with the risk of exacerbating military revalry, which offers only an additional threat to each side.

Soviet military doctrine is based on the fact that the USSR is an opponent of nuclear war in any form and that it will adhere strictly to the commitment not to be the first to use nuclear weapons. We are in favor of confining military potential within the limits of a reasonable sufficiency. But the nature and level of those limits depend on the actions of the United States and its partners in the blocs. The Soviet Union does not lay claim to greater security, but will not accept lesser security.

Mankind has reached a turning point where he must make a choice: Either overcome the inertia of the past, when security was seen first and foremost from the standpoint of strength, or remain a hostage to the arms race -- the race for nuclear, chemical, and in the future other equally terrible weapons. This choice between what reason suggests and what leads to catastrophe must be bold and responsible. It is too late for the half-hearted solutions that slowed down the arms race in certain avenues while it forged ahead with redoubled force in others. The time has come to take major steps together toward ridding the planet of the mountains of weapons and toward ensuring that security for each one means security for all.

The centerpiece of the Soviet Union's foreign policy in the years to come will be the struggle to implement the program put forward in the 15 January statement of the general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee. Its main point must be the phased elimination of nuclear weapons, so as to make it possible, by the end of this century, finally and irreversibly to remove the sword of Damocles which has hung over the people since the tragedy of Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

This historical task can be resolved in only one way -- the direct way: by eliminating the nuclear weapons themselves. Attempts to create the notorious "space shield" would only spur on the arms race and make it irreversible. We cannot allow the "star wars" program to be used as a barrier in the path of radical disarmament. Seeking to help overcome this obstacle, the Soviet Union has expressed readiness to resolve the question of medium-range missiles in the European zone separately, without direct links with the problems of strategic arms in space. If it was possible, without delaying or complicating the matter with other problems, to eliminate the Soviet and American missiles in Europe, that would untie one of the complex knots in world politics and clear the way for the radical reduction of nuclear weapons and then for their complete elimination.

In the nuclear age we cannot live according to the customs of the Stone Age, when the main concern was to get hold of a bigger stick or a heavier stone. Relying wholly on military force, as people have done for centuries and millenia, means pushing mankind toward nuclear self-destruction. Unfortunately, precisely this gulf between political thinking and the realities of the age is demonstrated by the U.S. Administration's response to the Soviet proposals, a response accompanied by calls for the still more energetic buildup of military muscle. "Strength is the most convincing argument we have. We will not deprive America of its trump card at the negotiating table with the Soviet Union -- these words from the U.S. President illustrate Washington's political philosophy.

It is hard to find in the response to the Soviet initiatives or in recent public statements by the U.S. leadership any serious willingness to resolve in practice the cardinal problems of removing the nuclear threat. In the opinion of the White House incumbent, the program for the total elimination of nuclear weapons is "an unsuitable topic for discussion at the present time." This idea is fenced about with "conditions" and "linkages." First, they say, it is necessary to eliminate the imaginary inequality in conventional arms, to settle regional conflicts on U.S. terms, to "change the behavior" of the Soviet Union in the international arena. The radical reduction of strategic arsenals is made conditional on our consent to the "star wars" program.

The elimination of nuclear weapons in Europe is blocked by references to the position of Britain and France. Here too they artificially drag in questions of the military balance in Asia, whose practical resolution is provided for at the relevant stage in the Soviet program. The U.S. ruling circles' reluctance to embark on the path of nuclear disarmament is manifested most clearly in connection with the question of nuclear explosions, an end to which is demanded by the whole world.

It is clear that the United States still has people who lay claim to a special security adapted to suit them alone. Calls for strength, which is still regarded as the most convincing argument in world politics, remain current in Washington. It seems some people are simply afraid of the opportunity which has emerged for a major, long-term thaw in Soviet-U.S. relations and in the international situation in general.

Militarist, aggressive circles would prefer to freeze and perpetuate confrontation. How should the USSR respond to this? By indignantly slamming the door? The possibility is not ruled out that that is precisely what they want to push us into. But Soviet Communists are aware of their responsibility for the country's future and the future of the world. Therefore they do not intend to play into the hands of those who are trying to make mankind learn to live with the nuclear threat, with the arms race. The USSR's foreign policy is oriented toward the quest for mutual understanding, toward dialogue, toward the establishment of peaceful coexistence as the universal norm in relations between states.

"The party," the new edition of the CPSU Program says, "will seek the development of the process of relaxation of international tension, regarding it as a natural and necessary stage along the path toward the creation of an all-embracing and reliable security system."

The idea of creating an all-embracing system of international security, whose fundamental principles in the military, political, economic, and humanitarian spheres were formulated at the 27th CPSU Congress, has met with the widest response throughout the world. In the military sphere this system is based on the renunciation by the nuclear powers of war against each other or against third states -- either nuclear or conventional. It is based on the need to prevent an arms race in space, to stop all nuclear weapons tests and entirely eliminate those weapons, to ban and destroy chemical weapons, and to renounce other weapons of mass destruction. It is proposed to lower, under strict control, the level of states' military budgets proportionately and commensurately.

The 27th CPSU Congress appealed to all governments, parties, and public organizations that are really concerned for the future of peace on earth, to all peoples, to cooperate still more closely in resisting the threat of war. International reaction is by no means omnipotent. The development of the world revolutionary process and the upsurge of mass democratic and antiwar movements have considerably widened and strengthened the tremendous potential of peace, reason, and good will, a potential which acts as a mighty counterweight to imperialism's aggressive policy.

Nuclear catastrophe must be averted. We can and must build a world of good-neighborliness, in which each people holds a worthy place respected by others. The Soviet Union seeks precisely such a secure world.

THATCHER REJECTS USSR PROPOSAL ON UK ARMS FREEZE

LD102131 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2105 GMT 10 Mar 86

[By Tom McMullan, PA political staff]

[Text] Mrs Thatcher is understood to have told the Soviet Union that Russian proposals for a freeze on the present level of Britain's nuclear capability are not acceptable as a condition for negotiations to remove intermediate-range nuclear weapons from Europe. Her reply to Soviet leader Mr Gorbachev's arms control proposals was delivered in Moscow tonight by the British ambassador, Sir Bryan Carledge.

According to diplomatic sources, Mrs Thatcher described as "unacceptable" the Soviet conditions on Britain's minimum strategic force. The implication of the Soviet offer was that Britain would not go ahead with the deployment of the Trident missile system.

In his proposals, outlined some months ago, Mr Gorbachev called for the removal of nuclear weapons from the earth by the end of the century.

The prime minister, in her reply, is said to have emphasised that the goal of a nuclear-free world was necessarily long-term. For the foreseeable future, nuclear weapons as a deterrent would continue to make an essential contribution to peace and stability, she is reported as saying.

The reply is said to have suggested that an effort should be made to concentrate on achieving realistic, balanced and verifiable arms control measures across the board, on the basis of detailed proposals already on the table.

Mrs Thatcher is also said to have stressed a need to correct the imbalance in conventional forces, and to widen East-West discussions to include regional, bilateral and human rights issues.

The reply, which was handed to a Soviet deputy foreign minister, was drafted after intensive consultations with the United States and other allies. The ambassador had hoped to hand the reply to Foreign Minister Mr Eduard Shevardnadze, but it was said in Moscow that he might not be available for some time.

Mr Shevardnadze is due to visit London this year, possibly in May, when the points at issue will be followed up.

ACADEMICIAN COUNTERS SDI JUSTIFICATIONS

LD101946 Moscow TASS in English 1910 GMT 10 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow March 10 TASS -- To hold that an impenetrable anti-missile shield will be created as a result of the implementation of the United States SDI programme means to be beguiled with illusions dangerous for entire humanity. Such is the opinion of Academician Vsevolod Avduyevskiy, Soviet scientist prominent in the sphere of scientific and technical problems of space flights.

In an interview to a TASS correspondent, he emphasised a realistic nature of the concept of universal security advanced in the Political Report of the CPSU Central Committee to the 27th Congress of the Soviet Communists.

It showed convincingly, the scientist said, that present armaments do not hold out hope to any state to protect itself by military-technical means alone. This is the viewpoint from which to regard also the U.S. "Strategic Defence Initiative" which is being publicised as a means of "absolute protection against strategic missiles."

The creators of SDI progamme assert that it will replace the existing strategic balance between the USSR and the USA with a strategy that "does not threaten anyone." It must rely on a space system with the use of directed energy weapons based on new physical principles. But supplementing the U.S. strategic offensive weapons with such a system will lead to a sharp destabilisation of the situation, the academician said. In counter-measure to the creation of the space "shield," means to penetrate it can also be upgraded. Uncertainty about the parity will arise in this connection, mutual distrust will be increased, strategic weapons will be built up and the world will be rapidly moving to the brink of nuclear war.

If the other side also takes the road of the creation of the ABM system with space-basing elements, it will be very difficult to evaluate the correlation of forces because of structural and technical peculiarities of the two ABM systems, even if their distinctions are insignificant. Tension and the arms race will inevitably be stepped up in this case. In other words, SDI will not render nuclear weapons "impotent and obsolete." Its true aim is to create possibilities for dealing with impunity a first nuclear strike at the USSR and then to repulse a retaliatory, already weakened strike of Soviet missiles.

The alternative to such a use of space is its peaceful exploration stimulation many spheres of science and technology, true development of peoples, Vsevolod Avduyevskiy said. The only way to survive in the nuclear age is the policy of arms reduction, of keeping from the militarisation of space. Such precisely is the essence of the Soviet peace initiatives endorsed by the forum of the Soviet Communists that ended on March 6.

SEISMOLOGIST ASSURES OF TEST MONITORING ABILITY

[Text] Leningrad March 11 TASS -- "The unilateral moratorium announced by the Soviet Government on nuclear weapon testing is an act of good will which is not only of a high humane value but is also of great importance to contemporary science," stated Vladimir Kochetov, a prominent Soviet seismologist. "Each underground explosion at proving grounds," the scientist explained his thought, "as it 'slurs over' the overall picture of the natural seismic background of the plant and for some time prevents us from watching the state of the earth's interior and from prognosticating possible foci of earthquakes."

Vladimir Kochetov is heading one of the world's oldest seismic stations, the Pulkovo, near Leningrad. This is an international centre for recording seismic activity in the Artic and in Antarctica. Data on all tectonic manifestations in the polar regions of the earth are generalised at the centre every year.

"Up-to-date apparatus makes it possible to record and with great accuracy to determine the epicentres of the slightest earth tremors even in regions which are so far from us", the seismologist emphasized. "The absurdity of assertions that undergroud nuclear tests are allegedly impossible to verify by national technical means is particularly obvious to us specialists.

The systems of international procedures for the observance of the moratorium, which are proposed in Mikhail Gorbachev's statement aimed at reducing and eliminating nuclear arsenals by the year 2000, may become all the more effective."

"Mikhail Gorbachev once again emphasized in the Political Report of the CPSU Central Committee to the 27th Congress of the party that all-embracing, strictest verification is perhaps the key element of the disarmament process", the scientist said.

"The moratorium on all nuclear explosions, I am sure, has already had an effect on the readings of seismic-station instruments around the world and has become an eloquent illustration of the practicability of full verificaition of underground experiments with weapons of mass destruction," Vladimir Kochetov said. The Soviet scientist is convinced that the Soviet Government's concrete steps on the way to disarmament are prompted by a high awareness of responsibility for the utilisation of scientific achievements exclusively for peaceful purposes.

GORBACHEV REPLIES TO NAZI CAMP SURVIVORS

[Text] Paris March 10 TASS -- The Soviet Embassy in France, acting on instructions from General Secretary of the CPSU Central Committee Mikhail Gorbachev, has handed over a Soviet reply to Pierre Durand, president of the international committee of former inmates of Buchenwald Dora, to a message sent to the leaders of the Soviet Union and the United States on behalf of the international committees of former inmates of Oswiecim, Buchenwald Dora, Mauthausen, Naizweiler Struthof, Neuengamme, Ravensbrueck and Sachsenhausen. The reply notes that support for the "spirit of Geneva," for actions towards lessening tension and averting the threat of a new war on the part of those who personally experienced all the horrors of the Second World War is valued in a special way in the Soviet Union.

We quite agree with the opinion, expressed in the message, that it is time to stop the escalation of war preparations, the reply says. As to the Soviet Union, it is precisely with this aim in view that, shortly after the Soviet-American summit meeting and in the spirit of Geneva, it put forward on January 15, 1986 a concrete plan for eliminating all nuclear and chemical weapons and radically improving the international situation. There is a sincere hope in the Soviet Union that the message-expressed wish that the Soviet Union and the United States act to ensure peace on earth in the spirit of the alliance which united their peoples forty years ago in the common struggle for freedom will be received in the United States just as positively as it is received by all Soviet people. The Soviet people are deeply convinced that the common efforts by all states and peoples on earth will save the world from a new devastating war.

The message sent by the international committees of former inmates of Nazi concentration camps to Mikhail Gorbachev and Ronald Reagan points to disastrous consequences of nuclear conflict, and expresses satisfaction with the calls for reduced nuclear arsenals. Its authors hope that these statements will be matched shortly by concrete decisions. The first results, as well as proposals advanced and measures adopted, although of a unilateral character so far, generate hopes for that. The former inmates of Nazi concentration camps appeal to the Soviet Union and the United States to continue the search for all possibilities for attaining detente, accord and disarmament with a view to ensuring peace on earth in the spirit of the alliance which united the peoples of the USSR and the United States forty years ago in the common struggle for freedom.

On receiving Mikhail Gorbachev's reply, Pierre Durand said in a TASS interview, I want to express my full satisfaction with its contents. I'm pleased that the Soviet leader found time to give a reply and displays such respect for the victims of fascism and those who are fighting against its resurgence. We note, went on the president of the international committee for former inmates of Buchenwald Dora, that Mikhail Gorbachev backed our idea that the Soviet Union and the United States act in the struggle for peace in the spirit of the anti-fascist alliance that existed forty years ago. The former inmates of Nazi concentration camps remember not only the grief brought in by the past war, but also the years of the existence of the anti-Hitler coalition in which the Soviet Union played the chief part. That is why we now favour concerted efforts in the name of strengthening peace. It is the duty of the former victims of Nazism and war to facilitate progress along the path of detente and disarmament. Certain hopes are inspired by the proposals and so far unilateral measures directed at consolidating peace. We hope that the words in favour of peace will be translated into actions, Pierre Durand stressed.

'TOP PRIORITY' DISCUSSES SECURITY CONCEPTS

LD081615 Moscow in English to North America 0000 GMT 8 Mar 86

["Top Priority" program presented by Pavel Kuznetsov with Dr Radomir Bogdanov and Dr Sergey Plekhanov, not further identified]

[Excerpts] Hello, and welcome to "Top Priority." I'm Pavel Kuznetsov, your host, sitting in for Vladimir Posner, and I hope that Vladimir will be with us shortly. Today with me are our usual panel, Drs Radomir Bogdanov and Sergey Plekhanov. And today's discussion is the first after the 27th Communist Party Congress concluded its work in Moscow, and naturally we will sum up, or try to sum up, some of the results, some of the documents, some of the decisions in the foreign policy field that were raised and formulated at the congress in Moscow.

And the first thing that comes to mind is the Soviet concept of security. And I suggest that we go point by point discussing this, what I think is a very important concept, a very important formula.

[Bogdanov] You know, to my mind, we all of us, we face a difficulty now in the international relations. The difficulty is that there's kind of a gap between the statement of fact, which is that the nuclear danger is lying over our heads -- and this danger is not diminishing, it just increases, and I believe that that threat was not contested by common people in the world, except of course some people at the American end -- and, if you come back to President Reagan's latest two speeches, when this new phenomena, nuclear phenomena, nuclear danger is, literally speaking, ignored by the American President, then of course then you may agree with that that phenomena is there, that gap there. And we should have something to fill up this gap, and what I mean by that: there is a statement of fact but there is no remedy for that. What is the remedy? How to cope with this new phenomena, with this danger lying over all of us? So, I think that in the Political Report to the 27th congress we have tried to fill up this gap, to suggest some remedies to the world, and I would like to share these, you know, points of our remedies, which we call basic, with our American listeners. And I, I still believe that if our American listeners will think along the lines we are trying to explain to them, they will also come to the conclusion that our main problem, psychological and human problem, of nowadays, is just how to meet two ends.

So, we in the Political Report, we have suggested the so-called basics of new approach to the solution of international problems, always keeping in mind that this is nuclear danger, all human danger. It's not only danger for capitalist world or socialist world, it's our human danger, for all of us. So I believe there is a very strong logic in what we have suggested on 15 January, in our famous statement, how to deal with the new situation where we have suggested to get rid of nuclear weapons by the end of this century, and with the political, you know, solutions, we suggest in that report. And, what comes to my mind still that we, we've been trying to formulate a new conception of security. What is new in that conception? To my mind the newest thing is that we have been used for so many centuries, as you like, if you like, to cope with the security problems with one remedy, to build up more and more arms.

[Kuznetsov interrupts] A military angle.

[Bogdanov] Oh yes, you are right, it was a military angle, and we have always been associating security problems with a military solution.

And what is military solution? It is very simple: you just build up more and more arms. And maybe for the first time we say no, it's very wrong approach. In the nuclear era you cannot solve your security problems with the arms race and with building endlessly nuclear arms. Then what is the solution? There is only one solution: political one.

What does it mean? It means, you know, a lot of things, but at the same time it means very concrete areas of political actions that you should cover by those actions just to reach your goal, to build up a new world, world without tension, world with cooperation, in which a principle of peaceful coexistence becomes a really universal one for everybody. And let me just, before you also say something about that, note down that our basics cover the whole range of the problems. It has been divided into four parts, you know. Why in the four parts beginning by the military field, ending by the humanitarian field? Because we believe now that the world has become so interdependent, so universal, unique one, if you like, that you cannot divide military field as the most important, the political is more important, and so on and so forth. No, all the four areas are important to solve your security problems.

[Plekhanov] Yeah, this is a very important point, because, if we analyze the previous attempts of achieving security through political means we will see that politics was often seen as simply another way of applying force, trying to put forward solutions which were based on inequality, on downgrading the security of your potential opponents. And that, of course, doomed very many attempts. For instance, in arms control, if you approach arms control negotiations which are a political way of achieving security, but if you approach it from a position of strength, from a position of trying to achieve superiority over the other side, that political solution is doomed, because the other side will never accept unequal terms. So, this point is very important, that security can be achieved not at the expense of the other side but only together with it, with due regard to its interests and on the basis of equal security. As Comrade Gorbachev emphasized in his report, in relations between the Soviet Union and the United States security can only be mutual.

[Bogdanov] Mutual, it means what, mutual? There is no Soviet security without American security. And vice versa, there is no American security without Soviet security. But what does it mean? It means that both sides take into consideration their vital national interests. They recognize that both of them, they're entitled to their interests you know, but if you talk about superiority, if you're aiming at superiority, what does it mean by the way, Pavel, what does it mean nowadays to have superiority? It means first of all you coerce your opponent into doing what you like him to do. You just threaten him, you know: if you don't (?follow on) my wishes, I will destroy you. That's very simple, you know. That's what worries us in the conception of superiority.

[Kuznetsov] And also I think it's important to discuss the notion of unilateralism. It also has to do with the traditional approach to security. You know, you only take care of your own interests -- and the others? And hell take the others. I was struck by a statement coming from the President's press secretary, Patrick Buchanan, in connection with Vladimir Posner's appearance on ABC newscasts from Moscow. He thought that it was something inherently wrong to offer a Soviet spokesman, to hear his comments, on the American defense budget, defense activities, whatever is done in the defense area, because he emphasized that this is a problem which is for us Americans to discuss, and it's no business of the Russians. I was struck by it because this is exactly what's wrong with the current situation. When the U.S. officials, a whole host of spokesmen of the United States, consider it not only appropriate but highly desirable to discuss Soviet defense activities, Soviet levels of defense spending, Soviet programs ...

[Bogdanov interrupts] [Words indistinct] not discussing but just lying about Soviet defense activities. It makes a lot of difference, discussing and lying.

[Plekhanov] And when some individual from the Soviet Union, you know, spends 2-3 minutes on ABC news, [laughing] to say something about what the President advanced, that's you know, that's a terrible scandal.

[Kuznetsov] And at this point I would like to sum up the Soviet concept of security, which, in a nutshell, boils down to the following:

1. Modern weapons are so powerful that security can be ensured through political solutions, not through military ones. Building up defenses, no matter how powerful they may be deemed, does not lead to greater security but results in higher levels of insecurity.

2. In Soviet-American relations security can only be mutual and in a broader context of international relations it can only be universal.

3. There's got to be respect for equality and security concerns of all sides. As far as Soviet-American relations go, we have to live in peace together and to cooperate, and there is no other alternative.

4. In our rapidly changing world aspirations for military superiority can bring no political gain to anybody. We have to live in a civilized manner, and we have to work out an all embracing system of international economic security without discrimination and sanctions.

Well, in our future talks, in our future panel discussions, we'll be talking in greater length about major world problems raised at the 27th Communist Party Congress in Moscow. And now I'd like to thank you, Dr Bogdanov, and you, Dr Plekhanov, for taking part in Top Priority, our weekly panel discussion.

WESTERN PRESS REACTION TO CPSU CONGRESS VIEWED

LD092125 Moscow Television Service in Russian 1530 GMT 9 Mar 86

["Telebridge Moscow-London-Paris- Washington" program moderated by political observer Igor Fesunenko in Moscow, with reporters Eduard Sorokin in London; Anatoliy Potapov in Paris; and Vladimir Dunayev in Washington -- live; from the "Vremya" program]

[Text] [Fesenenko] Good evening, esteemed comrade TV viewers. Our correspondents in Washington, Paris, and London are taking part in our TV hook-up which today is being conducted from Studio 20 of the Ostankino TV center. Let's check our lines: Vladimir Pavlovich Dunayev in Washington, Anatoliy Georgiyevich Potapov in Paris -- can you hear us, Anatoliy Georgiyevich?

[Potapov] Everything is fine at this end, we wait for your questions.

[Fesunenko] Eduard Alekseyevich Sorokin is working in London. Comrade Sorokin, can you hear us?

[Sorokin] Yes.

[Fesunenko] That is excellent. If everyone is ready , we shall begin. I would like to ask you, esteemed colleagues, to describe how the work of the 27th congress of our party was covered in your countries.

Judging by news agencies' reports we were receiving here in Moscow, we arrived at the conviction that there was very great interest throughout the world in the work of the CPSU Congress. Vladimir Pavlovich, it would be interesting to find out if we are not mistaken: Tell us how the Americans saw the 27th CPSU Congress, what they got to know about it, and what was the congress coverage like in the U.S. press. Please go ahead, Washington.

[Dunayev] You know, here in the United States there was very great interest in the work of the congress. This is as it should be, because following the Geneva meeting, following the New Year message to the American people by Comrade Gorbachev, and following the Soviet Union's initiatives which have met with a great response here, everyone was interested in what would take place during the congress.

Unfortunately, television and press coverage of the congress' work was rather limited. However, at this moment I would like to note something else: this coverage was businesslike; it was informative rather than speculatively sensational, as is frequently the case. As far as those U.S. journalists who became used to being fed rumors and innuendos are concerned, the 27th CPSU Congress was an inconvenient event. There was open and fearless talk at the congress about slip-ups, problems, and obstacles in our path. Not only has this proved to be very important and useful for our country and our party, not only has it enhanced our party's prestige and authority on the international arena, but, you know, it also, if you like, took the daily bread away from various Sovietologists; it deprived these various Sovietologists of their work which usually consists of feeding off innuendos. And this is the kind of paradox which, at first sight, you seem to have here: The more open and honest our dialogue about problems becomes, the narrower the elbow-room for those who are ill-disposed toward us. And the U.S. press and TV coverage of the congress just happens to confirm this.

[Potapov] Well, one can say without any exaggeration that the work of the 27th congress has given rise to a most lively interest here in France, both among politicians, the mass media, and among the public. Whole pages were completely given over to this event in newspapers -- and this despite the fact that what is now in the center of the whole country's attention is a most hotly contested political campaign arond the elections to the parliament, due to take place next Sunday.

Comrade Gorbachev's report was outlined and commented on in a rather detailed fashion. The course of congress debates was covered daily. And here is a noteworthy detail: No one, not even among the outright enemies of our country, made so bold as to reject the special political importance of the congress, both for the Soviet Union and for international relations — not a single person, either from the political circles or from the mass media organs.

Of course, those who customarily organize anti-Soviet campaigns in France made sure that there was no shortage of falsehoods and tendentious distortions here. You know, even if you look through the prism of the French press reaction which sees the events in Moscow as being so impressive, there is already apparently a certain line drawn up by some organs of the press: to make the French people disbelieve in the implementation of the plans and transformations drawn up in Moscow.

How is what Comrade Gorbachev described as information that stupefies during the congress being fabricated? Well, let me give you the simplest of examples.

The news bulletin of the TV first program is on the air, and the presenter announces: We have just received a telephone call from our Moscow correspondent: the Soviet television program Vremya -- you can see how much attention they are paying us -- was late coming on the air by a whole 10 minutes and no explanations were given. And, with all seriousness, the presenter says: Just as soon as new information from Moscow is at hand, we will let you know about it. The sense here is this: In Moscow, where the congress is in progress, something is not quite right, something is going on.

And the French television viewers will never learn the reason behind this much trumpeted delay in the Vremya program. The fact is that a concert for the congress delegates was in progress in Moscow, and Soviet Television did not interrupt its relay, so as not to deprive its viewers of the pleasure of taking part in, and being present at this concert.

However, misinformation has done its work: It has sown the maggot of doubt in people's minds. And as for subsequent explanations -- well, they are neither here nor there. This is what these methods are like!

[Fesunenko] Thank you, Anatoliy Georgiyevich. And now it is London's turn. Eduard Alekseyevich, the first chapter of the Political Report of our party's Central Committee to the 27th congress, which treats the main trends in, and contradictions of the world today, thoroughly analyses the mutual relations among the three main centers of modern imperialism: the United States, West Europe, and Japan. Do you reckon that this provision in the Political Report and the correctness of this analysis can be illustrated by any examples, or any concrete instance from Great Britain's life today?

[Sorokin] Well, I will try. Great Britain is the United States' closest West Europe European ally. Incidentally, it is not as if the relations between the two countries were cloudless, far from it. In order to confirm this, let me quote one particular example: the case of the helicopter construction company Westland. Let me briefly recall the essence of the matter: The company turned out to be on the brink of bankruptcy and turned to foreign firms for help. One U.S. concern and the West European consortium expressed their readiness to offer assistance. Our television viewers are thoroughly familiar with the ups and downs of the struggle: Two ministers had to resign and Prime Minister Thatcher took a tortuously long time in Parliament to justify her actions.

Such particular examples aside, one would at present like to draw attention merely to one aspect: At first sight, everything boiled down to a clash between two personalities in the British Government. In essence, though, at stake was to make whatever tilt British foreign policy was to take more pronounced. Is it to continue to be oriented exclusively toward the United States, or is it to show some flexibility and build firmer bridges, linking it to other West European countries?

As can be seen, opinion became divided within the ruling Conservative Party. As for the main opposition party, the Labor Party, its foreign policy principles are quite concrete. If the party wins the next parliamentary elections, then, as its leaders state, the U.S. cruise missiles will return to the other side of the ocean, the plans to reequip the British submarine fleet with the Trident nuclear missile system will be repealed, and Britain will review its entire current nuclear strategy.

[Fesunenko] Thank you, London. The television hook-up from Studio 20 of the Ostankino TV center ends with this. And now back to our Vremya program announcers.

USSR SUPPORTS OPEC PRICE STABILIZATION EFFORTS

LD101155 Vienna OPECNA in English 1141 GMT 10 Mar 86

[Text] Caracas, 10 Mar. 86 (OPECNA) -- The Soviet Union is in total agreement with OPEC over the need to maintain oil market stability and achieve fair pricing policies, according to the Soviet ambassador to Venezuela, Vayno Vyalyas.

'The Soviet Union opposes in a clear and emphatic way the policies of those who want to bring OPEC to its knees,' he said in statements here.

Pointing out that the average price was between 16 and 17 dollars a barrel, he said Venezuela exported more than 30 varieties of curde and it was important to note that many were being sold through the government's 'internationalization' agreements aimed at safeguarding the coutnry's oil outlets.

The minister said these agreements included sales of 150,000 b/d [barrels per day] to Veba Oil of West Germany, 130,000 b/d to Citco of the United States and additional quantities of about 60,000 b/d to Steuart in the U.S. and Nynas in Sweden.

UN COMMISSION ATTACKS U.S. LATIN AMERICA POLICY

[Text] Geneva March 10 TASS -- Participants in the 42nd session of the United Nations Human Rights Commission, under way here, have completed the debate on the violation of human rights and basic liberties, specifically, in El Salvador, Paraguay and several other countries.

Statements by representatives of Nicaragua, Algeria, Belorussia, the International Association of Democratic Lawyers, Lebanon, the German Democratic Republic and the Soviet Union noted that terror and violence, the killings and "disappearances" of opponents of regimes and of democratics are continuing in El Salvador, Paraguay and several other Latin American countries.

The speakers drew the attention of the commission members to the fact that the United States, in a bid to preserve its political and economic positions in Latin American countries, is doing its utmost to block the struggle of the continent's people's for the eradication of dependence and foreign domination, for national liberation and social progress, for the genuine exercise of human rights.

Nicaragua's representative Rita Delia Casco, in her statement, emphasised that a human rights campaign also provides for a resolute struggle against colonialism and neocolonialism. In this connection she criticised the position of the United States which resorts to gross interference and sends venal gangs of counter-revolutionaries to suppress the striving of the peoples of Latin American countries for freedom and democracy. Washington's policy with regard to revolutionary Nicaragua, Rita Delia Casco stressed, is a vivid example of state-sponsored terrorism.

The grave situation in several Latin American countries, said Wolfgang Grieger, representative of the German Democratic Republic, is a consequence of U.S. aggressive policies in that region. This is evidenced by Washington's aggression against independent Grenada, by the undeclared war against revolutionary Nicaragua, by threats against Cuba and the constant violation of military aid to reactionary and dictatorial regimes.

PEACE, ANTIWAR FORCES GAINING STRENGTH WORLDWIDE

[Text] Moscow March 10 TASS -- It is the reality of the present-day world that the anti-war movements, irrespective of differences in ideological views of their participants, exert a great impact on the development of events in the world arena, Yuriy Zhukov, chairman of the Soviet Peace Committee, writes in his article printed in the latest issue of the INTERNATIONAL LIFE journal.

The main concern of the public movements is for survival of mankind, prevention of a nuclear catastrophe which hangs over comtemporary civilisation, the article stresses. All public movements, fighting for preservation and consolidation of peace, have a huge manpower potential. Provided mutual understanding and cooperation between them, if the deep-rooted prejudices, hampering this cooperation, are overcome, this will be a great asset for peace, the author of the article points out.

Broad opporunities in this direction are provided by the programme of the International Year of Peace which has been endorsed by the consensus at the 40th session of the U.N. General Assembly. It concludes very many important measures both international and national, starting from the international conference of non-governmental organisations in Geneva in January, 1986, which was keynoted by the slogan "Together for Peace," and ending with the World Congress of Peace Forces which is to be held in Copenhagen in October. It is being prepared by the International Preparatory Committee.

The foes of peace have lately sharply heightened their subversive activities against the world anti-war movement, the article runs. Front pseudo-movements are being formed, like the American "pro-peace" organisation which in a brief period of time acquired the annual budget of 30 million dollars and a 130-man highly-paid staff. But activities of the anti-war movements are invariably mounting, becoming more purposeful and forceful, contrary to all attempts of Western "psychological warfare" services to disorganise, to split, to mislead and divert those movements from the struggle for solution of the main tasks.

People become increasingly aware that the success of the peace forces, attained in Geneva, should not set one's mind at rest. There are no miracles in the world and persistent struggle is to be waged for materialisation of the accords reached in Geneva, the author of the article writes.

SFRY ENVOY AT UN URGES MEDITERRANEAN PEACE ZONE

[Text] New York March 7 TASS -- Yugoslavia actively supports efforts aimed at turning the Mediterranean into a zone of peace and cooperation, says a letter of the permanent representative of Yugosalvia at the U.N. sent to the U.N. secretary general. The convocation of an international conference on the Middle East under the U.N. aegis with the participation of all the parties concerned, including the Palestine Liberation Organization -- the only lawful representative of the Palestinian people should be one of the steps in this direction. Durable and stable security in the region can be achieved only along with the settlement of the Middle East problem, the letter stresses. The permanent mission of Yugoslavia also expressed serious concern in connection with the massive concentration in the Mediterranean of the military force and armaments, including nuclear armaments.

FOREIGN MINISTRY PROTESTS UN STAFF CUT DEMAND

LD111035 Moscow TASS International Service in Russian 0914 GMT 11 Mar 86

["Verbal Statement of the USSR Foreign Ministry to the U.S. Embassy in Moscow" -- TASS headline]

[Text] Moscow, 11 Mar (TASS) -- The USSR Ministry of Foreign Affairs lodges a resolute protest against the illegal demand of the U.S. Administration concerning the reduction of the number of staff of the USSR's permanent representation at the United Nations in New York. This action of the United States is arbitrary, unfounded and constitutes a crude violation by the United States of its duty, which it assumed as the country of the location of the central institutions of the United Nations; that is, to ensure the conditions necessary for normal activity of the United Nations and the unhampered participation of the member states of the organization in its work.

The Soviet side rejects as completely farfetched and unsubstantiated allegations that the staff of the permanent representation of the USSR at the United Nations are supposed to be involved in activity that is unrelated to UN affairs. As regards references by the U.S. side to an increase in Soviet personnel in recent years, they cannot in any way serve as a justification for this provocative action, because over this period there has been a significant expansion in the scale of the UN activity, and the number of Soviet staff with the quantity of the personnel at the U.S. mission to the United Nations, whose operation is provided for both by the State Department as well as by private firms, while the Soviet Government provides for all its own needs with its own resources.

Nothing in the existing international agreements, including also the 1947 agreement on the UN central institutions, gives the U.S. Government the right to set limits on numbers of personnel of the permanent representations of the UN member states which are, as it is well known, accredited not to the U.S. Government, but to the United Nations Organization.

The United States' pretensions to appropriate for itself the right to set the number of personnel of the permanent representations of the states in the United Nations are absolutely inadmissible. They cannot be qualified in any way other than as incompatible with international law and generally accepted practice, and they constitute interference in affairs, which are within the sole competence of the states and in their mutual relations with the United Nations.

Their target is to make more difficult the activity of the states in the United Nations and thereby that of the organization itself.

This reflects the general approach of the United States toward the activity of international organizations, which has manifested itself particularly vividly in the past few years, in particular in hostile statements addressed to the United Nations, in the blackmail of UNESCO, in arbitrary treatment and discriminatory restrictions against the missions of many UN member-states in New York and in the creation of an atmosphere of intimidation and terror around them. All of this is justly regarded by the world community as a line aimed at undermining the existing system of international organizations and at fettering their efforts in the development of relations of peace and cooperation among the peoples; and as an attempt to bring international mechanisms and institutions under U.S. dictate. It cannot thus be considered fortuitous that reaction to this is also manifested in the fact that the question is being raised of the propriety of the presence of the UN headquarters in a country that does not fulfill its obligations to that organization.

The above actions of the U.S. side cannot, of course, be perceived outside the general context of Soviet-U.S. relations. They are not only out of accord with their assurances about a desire to work toward an improvement in relations between the two countries, but also inflict direct damage on them. The U.S. Administration has to realize that such actions reinforce distrust toward its policies and by no means create a favorable background for a summit meeting.

In precisely the same way in must be clear that such actions cannot fail to have a most serious effect on the development of ties between our countries in various spheres. It is difficult to see compatibility between all this and statements by the U.S. side in favor of implementing accords on opening of general consulates in New York and Kiev, and on expansion of contacts and exchanges, including finding new forms of them.

Of course, the Soviet side cannot pass over such illegal actions by the United States and will be forced to draw the appropriate conclusions for itself.

All responsibility for the consequences of this fresh provocative and illegal action perpetrated by the United States will rest wholly and completely with the U.S. side.

PRAVDA VIEWS REAGAN'S CONTRA AID CAMPAIGN TACTICS

McCarthy Era Recalled

["Rejoinder" by N. Kurdyumov: "Intimidation"]

[Text] The U.S. Administration has recently launched a massive operation with the aim of securing Congressional approval for a new aid package to the tune of $100 million for the "contras," through whom Washington is trying to overthrow the legitimate Nicaraguan Government. The bill on granting the Somoza bands so-called "humanitarian" assistance that was approved last year expires on 31 March, and the administration is in a hurry to bestow additional appropriations on the cutthroats -- openly this time -- mainly for assisting with weapons.

The tone of the unbridled hate campaign against Nicaragua, in which the secretary of state, the secretary of defense, and other highly placed representatives of the administration participate, is being set by the President himself, who has assured the "contras" leaders (they were received in the White House the other day as most honored guests) that he will personally head the campaign of "maximum pressure" on Congress.

This is connected with the fact that Reagan's demand for allocating subsidies has come up against serious opposition on Capitol Hill, where many are voicing growing fears that giving military assistance to the "contras" could have irreparable consequences in the shape of direct American armed intervention in Nicaragua, not to mention the fact that such assistance will rule out the prospect of a peaceful settlement in the region and once and for all undermine the efforts of the Contadora Group, which are supported by almost all states in the Western Hemisphere.

Ignoring public opinion, the White House is resorting to direct intimidation of members of Congress in the spirit of the raving inquisitor McCarthy. Congressmen not in agreement with administration policy in relations to Nicaragua have been accused of playing into the communists' hands.

"Their actions are hostile to U.S. interests," R. Reagan said, answering a question from journalists about White House Director of Communications P. Buchanan's accusation in THE WASHINGTON POST that the Democrats are taking part in a communist plot against Central America — no more, no less.

"The administration is tolling the bell of Senator J. McCarthy's anticommunist era," a commentator for ABC TV observed in this connection. Well, it's true.

'Hysterical' Efforts Noted

[TASS report: "Tampering With the Facts"]

[Text] Washington, March 9 TASS — U.S. President Ronald Reagan is continuing to fuel a hysterical anti-Nicaraguan campaign mounted by his administration in an effort to railroad $100 million in aid for counterrevolutionary gangs through Congress.

In his latest radio address to the nation, the President poured strident abuse on the Sandinist government. The radio address spoke of "the longest military airstrip in Central America" allegedly being built to "handle Soviet bombers."

Commentators recalled in this connection that before the 1983 invasion of Grenada the White House chief had also made repeated use of a similar Washington-manufactured falsehood to the effect that Cuba and the Soviet Union were building "a military airfield" on the island for "aggressions" in the Western Hemisphere. As is known, that was soon exposed as a downright lie.

No wonder that American legislators are now openly sceptical of the president's contentions. ABC Television said: "They were also asking in Congress if the increases in military aid were to be followed by the dispatch of U.S. military advisers to Central America. The White House was responding that the appropriate decision had not yet been taken. Would lifting restrictions on military aid, as wanted by the President, mean that money from other sources such as the CIA's contingency fund would be brought into play as well. So the matter at issue really was not the $100 million but a sum much larger than that. Congress did not know in effect what it was to vote on."

In its attempts to exonerate U.S. aggressive policies in various regions, Washington, as shown by statements by the present U.S. Administration's leaders, has been increasingly resorting to gross deception, tampering with facts and perjury.

The masterminds of this campaign have wrapped themselves in so many lies that people in the United States today speak ever more often of a "crisis of confidence" in the White House statements, which is very much like the "crisis of confidence" at the height of the Vietnam adventure.

Deceit and falsification have not worked. According to an ABC public opinion survey, 59 percent against 34 percent of the polled Americans do not approve of aid for the "contras."

BOVIN ARTICLE VIEWS U.S. 'NEOGLOBALISM'

Part One

[First part of IZVESTIYA political observer Aleksandr Bovin article: "History Is Irreversible"]

[Text] Glancing back at mankind's history it is possible to argue to what extent moral progress and material progress, social progress and scientific and technical progress are synchronous, to what extent they are in step with each other, but progress itself is an indisputable fact. In history there are times of stagnation, there are zigzags and reversals, there are times of catastrophe and collapse of civilizations, there are attempts to flee into the past, yet nonetheless as a whole, history has always moved and is moving only forward.

And in this process, sudden major sociopolitical changes, revolutionary transformations, and classes and parties embodying the new and combating the old have always constituted the points of growth and acted as the catalysts of social progress. The 20th century is the century of the October Revolution. The seeds and the roots of the main contradictions and the main social achievements with which we are approaching the end of the century go back to 1917. There we find the roots of the colossal influence that the history of socialist Russia, the history of our country and our party has exerted on the whole development of historical events in the 20th century. The world public's attitude to the 27th CPSU Congress has confirmed this once again.

The fresh breath of self-criticism, the frank analysis of the phenomena of stagnation and of negative trends, and the orientation toward innovation in all spheres of life, toward extirpation of everything that discredits the party and compromises socialism -- this is the picture presented to the world by the 27th CPSU Congress. And the tremendous creative and constructive potential displayed by the party congress is further evidence of the irreversibility of history, the inexhaustible store of inner strength that enable the socialist society to draw lessons from the past, to overcome mistakes, and to continue to progress.

The 27th CPSU Congress' orientation toward the future is in sharp contrast with the general thrust of world imperialism's current strategy which is characterized by neoconservative tendencies in domestic and foreign policy, by hopes for a sociopolitical revenge, and by practical attempts to translate these hopes into reality. What I have in mind in particular is the so-called "Reagan doctrine," also known as the strategy of neoglobalism. Let us take a closer look at it.

My colleague Stanislav Kondrashov has described neoglobalism as the "doctrine of the reversibility of history." And that is what it is. The essence of the strategy of neoglobalism can be described as an attempt to halt and reverse social progress inasmuch as it is incompatible with U.S. "vital interests," with the preservation of the global U.S. military and political presence, and with U.S. claims to world leadership. Relying on its tremendous resources and on its gigantic war machine, in other words, relying on strength, the United States is challenging world history, clearly in the hope of "replaying" it, replacing the onward march of history with a perpetual cycle of capitalist forms of societal life.

It is hard to say how far the setting of this task is consciously understood and rationally motivated. It is quite likely that we are dealing not so much with an imperialist philosophy of history as with psychology, with a class instinct that harshly dictates a line of political behavior regardless of the possibility or impossibility of justifying that line rationally. In any event, whatever approach one adopts to the origins of the present American policy, neoglobalism is Washington's counteroffensive against history. Neoglobalism is an attempt to transform a way of life that American conservatives consider natural, but which is receding beyond recall into the past; to transform this way of life, I repeat, into the eternal future of all mankind.

Strictly speaking, the prefix "neo" should be viewed in highly relative terms. In effect Washington's entire postwar policy can be defined as globalist. Both in the sense of the geography of U.S. "vital interests." And in the sense of its social thrust, which is contrary to the thrust of the historical process.

Attempts to "freeze" history, to halt the chain reaction of social changes caused by the defeat of fascism, and to block and "roll back" socialism began immediately after World War II. And one of the most characteristic features of that version of globalism was the global support for dictatorial, despotic regimes that were regarded as strong points of a kind, making it possibly to contain the frightening pressure of the new times, the new era, the new order.

Let us remember. In Europe -- Franco and Salazar. In Asia -- Chiang Kai-shek, Syngman Rhee, Reza Pahlavi. In Latin America -- Batista, Stroessner, Romaro, Somoza. And that is far from an exhaustive list. There has not been a single reactionary, antipopular dictatorship that has not enjoyed U.S. patronage and support and received American money and American weapons.

What is this? Chance? No, of course not. The "great democracy" maintained the butchers and rogues because they served their patrons faithfully and loyally. Because they did not doubt America's right to modify the world to suit itself. Because they were fierce anticommunists, hated the Soviet Union, and dealt mercilessly with left-wing opposition.

Relations between "Uncle Sam" and his "nephews," so to speak, were not always idyllic. Washington sometimes got annoyed. Sometimes all kinds of "presidents for life" took offense and struck attitudes. Thus in 1963 the White House expressed displeasure at the nature of the activity of the "Tontons Macoutes." But "Papa Doc" -- the very same who said "I am democracy" -- rebelled and demanded the recall of the American ambassador from Port au Prince. In response the standard accusation came from Washington: Duvalier is receiving aid from Cuba and the "communist countries." Haiti complained to the UN Security Council. In a few months everything was back to normal...

American billions, American soldiers and weapons are capable of a great deal. All the same, tyrannical, antipopular, puppet regimes collapsed. Ruling cliques who were obedient to Washington and oriented toward the West were replaced by different people with different policies. And these were often radical left policies, breaking off ties with imperialism, rejecting the capitalist principles of organization of society, and not recognizing American "leadership."

"The hand of Moscow," Washington claimed. Or "the hand of Havana." At one time there was the "hand of Beijing" too. The standard reassuring explanation went roughly like this. Everything was supposedly fine. Everyone was living peacefully, everyone loved their local masters and their American patrons.

Then the perfidious "agents" came along and started muddying the water, inciting people against the authorities, and turning them against the Americans. And gullible people followed their lead. Primitive? Yes, but simple. And comprehensible. I would not be surprised if "hands" were soon discovered in Port au Prince and Manila...

At the same time -- not at the propaganda level, but at the policy level -- people in Washington have begun to realize that dictatorial regimes have outlived their day, that supporting them does not so much help the United States as discredit it and jeopardize American strategic interests. The events in Iran stimulated thought. An article by Jack Anderson in NEWSDAY was entitled "How U.S. Support for Dictators Harms Our Country." We are facing a sad fact, Anderson wrote. "The Iranian crisis is only the most recent and striking indication of the enmity that the United States has brought on itself by supporting repressive regimes in the name of the slogan of anticommunism, which we honor so devoutly." In Latin America and Africa, Anderson went on, we continue to support "shaky regimes led by successive generals who torture their compatriots with one hand and plunder them with the other. If it is not already too late," Anderson concludes, "a change in U.S. policy toward these repressive regimes could spare us new Tehrans... when the revolutionaries will inevitably throw out all these rogues."

In order to avoid this prospect, they are starting to give their favorite rogues lessons in democracy and modern political etiquette. They din it into them that reforms carried out in good time reduce social tension and lessen the effectiveness and attraction of radical demands. And those who would not or could not be hammered into a democratic mold had to be removed.

The night of 6 February saw, as THE WALL STREET JOURNAL put it, the "orderly departure of Duvalier" -- an American Air Force transport plane saved "Baby Doc" from the Haitian people's wrath. Events in the Philippines were more dramatic. Washington had long been concerned about the growing antigovernment sentiments in Manila. William Sullivan (he was U.S. ambassador to the Philippines, and later to Iran) wrote as long ago as the year before last: "A tremendous responsibility rests with us: We must not allow a real civil war to flare up in the Philippines." Citing the Iranian experience, Sullivan advised official Washington: "When we realize that change is inevitable, we must try to do all in our power to ensure that it is moderate change."

Washington tried; it tried to frighten Ferdinand Marcos with "communist rebels" and frightened itself with the prospect of losing its bases... But Marcos delayed, held on. The finale is well known: Early in the morning of 26 February, the former Philippine president and around 90 of his entourage took off on board an American Air Force transport plane...

Apparently the shah of Iran said that the United States throws its friends into the wastebasket like "used paper tissues." The shah knew what he was talking about. Incidentally, the reproach does not only apply to the Americans. Remember "Operation Barracuda" -- on 20 September 1979 French paratroopers turned the Central African Empire into the Central African Republic in the space of a couple of hours. Paris was thoroughly fed up with "Emperor Bokassa." Yet they used to be great friends...

I am sure the Americans will step up the pressure on the Chilean and South African regimes, since there is no shortage of transport planes. Especially since R. Reagan personally or, say, C. Weinberger is by no means sympathetic toward what is happening in Chile and South Arica. But here it is not a question of personal sympathies or abstract concern for the restoration of democracy. It is a question of real class interests.

It is a question of realizing that in present conditions the preservation of dictatorial regimes that belong to the past creates the soil for the undesirable radicalization of opposition sentiments. Consequently the controlled democratization and liberalization of such regimes is regarded as a better way of preventing radical social changes while preserving "Western," that is, capitalist systems.

For the Americans, the best versions of political power are the centrist, or, still better, the right-centrist versions. They therefore seek actively, for instance, to strengthen Duarte's positions in El Salvador. They therefore supported the recent changes in Guatemala. They view the change of power in Manila from the same standpoint. "The appointments made by C. Aquino thus far," a "prominent White House staffer" said, "are good and reputable. The ministerial cabinet is a centrist organ in which the left does not enjoy great influence. So far, things are not going badly." It is a bad thing when people drive out the Americans and stop listening to them. Who, specifically, it is who ensures obedience and the protection of U.S. interests is secondary. Formerly, this function was successfully fulfilled by dictators and puppets, but now Washington prefers to rely on more respectable figures. And where it can, it actively pushes such figures into the foreground.

Part Two

[Second and final part of article by IZVESTIYA political observer Aleksandr Bovin: "History Is Irreversible"]

[Text] Along with the flagrant desire to get rid of the most objectionable figures and thereby strengthen the positions of the "free world," Washington's strategy incorporates equally flagrant support for counterrevolutionary forces. In this context the Washington "neoglobalists" most often mention Nicaragua, Afghanistan, Angola, and Cambodia.

The main social base of counterrevolution and reactionary rebellions is made up of representatives of the former political elite, exploiters stripped of their privileges and influence, the numerous retainers who surrounded the powers that be. But let us not oversimplify the picture. Counterrevolution speculates on the objective difficulties of change and renewal in the conditions of economic backwardness, underdeveloped social structures, and the tremendous role played by traditions. Counterrevolution exploits for its own purposes impatience, errors, and miscalculations mainly of a maximalist nature, and weakness on the part of the political vanguard. All the nurtures counterrevolution, creates a favorable sociopolitical milieu for it, and pushes a proportion of the working people and peasantry into the rebels' camp.

The Washington "neoglobalists" set themselves the task of exploiting the revolution's difficulties, exaggerating them (propaganda and physchological warefare), and where possible, intensifying them (economic sanctions, blockades, and so forth) in order to promote the activation and consolidation of counterrevolutionary forces. This strategy is aimed at making the position of revolutionary governments more difficult, slowing down the stabilization of the situation, provoking the growth of antigovernment sentiments, and as a result bringing about a change of power.

This is the model of counterrevolutionary policy that the U.S. Administration has brought into play in its relations with Nicaragua. Speaking in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and upholding the President's request for the appropriation of $100 million for aid to the "contras," Secretary of State G. Shultz, described the aid to the Nicaraguan counterrevolution as "legally, morally, and strategically justified."

But evidently even the U.S. Congress doubts that. Otherwise the administration would not have to make such efforts every time to persuade congressmen to sanction the allocation of additional funds for the "contras."

The congressmen's hesitations are very understandable. After all, if you throw off the camouflage nets of diplomatic verbiage, it is a question of money intended for direct interference in the affairs of a sovereign state with which the United States, moreover, has diplomatic relations. When Washington says that the administration's aim is to "turn Nicaragua away from communism," everyone realizes that in effect this means setting a course toward the violent overthrow of the country's legitimate government. By American standards, that can be done, but should not be spoken of. Hence the congressmen's confusion.

U.S. special envoy to Central America Harry Shlaudeman recently tried to persuade President Alan Garcia of Peru to support Washington's position. This was the president's reply: "The United States should observe the Nicaraguan people's right to have what government they like, whatever objections we may have." And he went on: "Any aggression or intervention against Nicaragua or any other Central American country will be regarded by the Peruvian Government as aggression against the whole of Latin America." And it is not only Peru that thinks that way.

Among the arguments used to justify the policy of global counterrevolution, probably the chief place belongs to appeals to democracy. People in Washington are indignant that in Nacaragua they punish those who break revolutionary laws, that in Angola they strike against Savimbi's bandits, that in Afghanistan they shoot dushmans who are caught carrying weapons, and they they drive Pol Pot's supporters out of Cambodia. People in Washington are annoyed because the revolution does not recognize the counterrevolution's freedom to undermine the new system and to plunder and carry out reprisals against the peaceful population.

The loud moans about "human rights" are utter hypocrisy and falsehood. Revolutions -- and in the late 20th century this is taught not only at Moscow State University, not only at Karl Marx University or the University of Havana, but also at Harvard, Oxford, and the Sorbonne -- revolutions are the most complex, contradictory periods in the peoples' lives, periods filled with drama. The age-old foundations of life are being agonizingly shattered. A new social structure is being born, born in a fierce struggle, in bloody clashes between those who want to preserve at all costs the old order -- perhaps improve and "ennobled," but still the old order -- and those who are breaking through toward fundamentally new levels of civilization. And situations arise where the future of the revolution weights more heavily on the scales of history than "human rights." Salvador Allende was reluctant to reckon with that fact -- and he died. So will we augment the numbers of martyrs of the revolution and victims of counterrevolution for the sake of "democracy?"

Let us look at the classical, textbook examples. When the English or the French cut off the heads of their kings, when they executed the aristocrats, they evidently had a rather different view of "human rights" than those who appeal to the West's "democratic heritage." Or perhaps it was the "hand of Moscow" which guided the actions of Cromwell or Robespierre? I am afraid that Americans, defending their own independence, did not give very much thought to the rights of the English.

Nor can the Civil War between North and South easily be regarded as a model of the observance of "human rights." On 24 September 1862 Abraham Lincoln issued a proclamation suspending the law of inviolability of the individual. It is believed that by the end of the war approximately 38,000 traitor and conspirators had been arrested, all those who were hindering the government in its struggle against the rebels. The Sandinists can hardly compare with that!

Lincoln's reply to accusations of human rights violations and the flouting of democracy was: "... Surely it is more expedient to break one law than to permit the annihilation of all laws and the fall of the government?" If time was reversible, it would probably not be hard to demonstrate that Lincoln had taken lessons from Ortega.

It would be a fine thing if there were no need to fight for freedom, justice, and independence, if it were possible to do without blood, deaths, and cruelty. It would be a fine thing if the ruling minority, the "ruling class," were to yeild its positions without a fight, without resistance. But that can hardly be relied on. The history of revolutions indicates otherwise. And in order to defend the future for millions of people, to create conditions in which the rights of those millions will become real rights, it is necessary to restrict the rights of those "humans" who take up arms to defend their past.

In principle, neoglobalism is doomed, since -- again, in principle -- history is irreversible. The strength on which Washington pins such hopes is powerless to put history into reverse and take us back to the times of Theodore Roosevelt or the "Holy Alliance." Of course, the importance of strength is relative. Within certain limits, local and limited in time and space, strength can retard, disrupt the natural course of events, roll back a revolution and ensure the triumph of counterrevolution. That happened in Chile. It happened in Grenada. And we cannot yet exclude the possibility of its happening again. Therefore the open proclamation of the doctrine of neoglobalism has a positive side -- it prompts vigilance. The revolution must know how to defend itself.

Our analysis of imperialism's neoglobalist strategy will not be complete unless we examine it within the overall system of coordinates of world politics and West-East relations. The emergence of military-strategic parity created a military-political stalemate here. A large-scale war means destruction and catastrophe. The natural way out is to seek agreement on mutual security, to feel your way toward the outlines of a compromise opening up prospects for disarmament. But Washington got stuck halfway. People there seem to realize that to begin a nuclear missile war would be suicidal. But they do not yet realize that to continue the arms race is to increase the probability of war.

Hence the ambivalence, the internal disunity of positions, the combination of that cowboy bravado with caution, calls for dialogue, and reluctance to take confrontation to the danger point. Hence, too, the quest for peripheral areas where imperialism can go onto the counteroffensive and regain its lost bridgeheads without risk of provoking a general conflict. And they found them. It was decided to step up the pressure on still insecure young states that are in the process of formation, and to that end to openly support and galvanize counterrevolutionary, antigovernmental formations. They called it neoglobalism, emphasizing the U.S. Administration's readiness to interfere in internal conflicts and support reaction in any part of the globe.

External support for counterrevolution makes the elimination of reactionary rebels more difficult and long-drawn-out, leads to additional deaths, and slows down the process of essential transformations. At the same time imperialism's interference in a particular country's affairs will promote the consolidation of the forces of the revolution, the mobilization of its inner reserves, and the buildup of internationalist aid. In the end imperialism will lose. And although the possibility of a "second Grenada" cannot be ruled out, the future belongs to a "second Cuba" or "second Vietnam."

Whatever the difficulties along the path of man's social and spiritual emancipation, it was said at the 27th CPSU Congress, "the course of history is irreversible." And no neoglobalism can change that.

BUSH REMARKS ON U.S. POLICY IN AFRICA ASSAILED

[Text] Washington, 10 Mar (TASS) -- The United States' course of supporting the racist regime in South Africa and of encouraging the National Union for the Total Liberation of Angola [UNITA] terrorist gangs was confirmed by U.S. Vice President G. Bush, at a news conference in the U.S. Embassy in Lisbon.

Bush zealously defended the White House's decision to supply many millions of dollars worth of military aid to the UNITA terrorist group, which the United States and the racist Republic of South Africa [RSA] are employing against Angola. It has emerged from what he said that the United States is aspiring to play no greater and no less a role than that of...'Liberator of Angola.' And the means of achieving this are the UNITA bandits that he, with the unceremoniousness characteristic of American politicians, has tried to portray as "freedom fighters." Moreover, in Bush's opinion, arms deliveries to bandits guilty of the death of Angolan civilians and the destruction of civil facilities "make national reconciliation in Angola easier."

Journalists pointed out to the vice president that by giving assistance to the UNITA terrorists to the detriment of sovereign Angola the United States is refusing to help the African National Congress [ANC] which advocates abolishing the monstrous apartheid system. In reply, Bush attacked the ANC and admitted that "supporting the ANC, whose ranks include Marxists, does not correspond to the aims and interests of U.S. policy in the region." The U.S. leader virtually supported the Botha regime's policy of pseudoreform, with which the racists are attempting to perpetuate the inhuman apartheid system.

The vice president yet again spoke in favor of the infamous "link" between granting Namibia independence, which is occupied by the United States's ally, the Pretoria regime, and the withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola. It is well known that the Cuban internationalists are in Angola at the request of that country's legitimate government to repulse South African aggression. He made it clear that Washington favors the removal of the South West African People's Organization (SWAPO), the group leading the Namibian people's liberation struggle, from the settlement process. Bush cynically stated that what should be at issue in Namibia is a certain 'reconciliation of rival forces' and not a complete and final cessation of the occupation.

In essence Bush's address lays out the basic clauses of the 'neoglobalist' doctrine as applied to Africa with which the current U.S. Administration has armed itself. This doctrine implies Washington's 'rights' to open interference in the affairs of sovereign states and to suppress national liberation movements.

COMMENTARY ON BUSH REMARKS AT FULTON CEREMONY

LD102144 Moscow Domestic Service in Russian 1900 GMT 10 Mar 86

[Commentary by political observer Aleksandr Zholkver]

[Text] It so happened that the Washington festivities on the occasion marking the 40th anniversary of former British Prime Minister Churchill's Fulton speech coincided with the work of the 27th CPSU Congress. I am far from ready to compare these two events which cannot be compared in their scale. However, it is noteworthy to compare the basic foreign policy principles recently proclaimed in Moscow and Washington.

The resolution adopted on the Central Committee Political Report at our party congress points out that the main direction of CPSU activity in the international arena remains the fight against the nuclear danger and the arms race and for the maintenance and consolidation of universal peace. Moreover it is emphasized that the Soviet Union will fight for the realization of the program of eliminating mass destruction weapons and averting a new world war. With this aim in mind, the bases for the creation of an all-embracing system of international security were proposed at the congress.

But what type of world affairs concept does Washington propose? Vice President Bush, who was the main speaker at the Fulton ceremony, gave every assurance that Churchill was allegedly right and that one must continue to rely on the use of force in future. One can drew practical conclusions from this. Bush called for investing some resources in armaments, including space weapons, and the implementation of a policy of neoglobalism, from support for the contras in Nicaragua to strengthening the United States military positions in Europe, which the U.S. vice president called "the king on the global chess board."

This type of aggressive credo again confirms the CPSU congress conclusion that it is precisely imperialism that is responsible for the conflicts of our time and for the unleashing and whipping up of the arms race. However, something else also is true. The times of Churchill and his stake on force have clearly passed. This is recognized by increasing numbers of politicians even in the United States as well as in Washington itself, where an influential group of congressmen and senators just recently called for an end to the arms race and nuclear tests. No matter how great the threat of war is, our party proceeds from the fact that there is no fatal inevitability of a world war. It is possible to prevent war and save mankind from catastrophe. This is the historic vocation of socialism and all progressive and peace-loving forces throughout the world.

ANTITERRORIST BILL CALLED 'INTERNATIONAL BANDITRY'

[Vladimir Bolshakov "commentary": "Excessive Ambitions"]

[Text] International law, as is well known, grants no state, and that includes the United States, the prerogative to resolve virtually all the world's problems as it sees fit, to interfere in sovereign states' internal affairs, or to indicate which system, friends, or trading partners to choose. Hopefully, they are aware of this in Washington. But their attitude is: So much the worse for international law.

The U.S. Senate quite recently gave new confirmation of these imperial ambitions and a desire to pose as "mankind's Supreme Court." It approved a bill on "punishing terrorists for crimes committed against American citizens abroad."

This bill, which has now been sent to the House of Representatives for examination, is actively supported by the White House. The bill "empowers" the U.S. Administration "to prosecute and punish persons who have perpetrated the terrorist purposes" acts of murder or attacks on American citizens abroad as well as "accessories to the crime," irrespective of where these persons are or where the crime is committed.

American fighters' interception of an Egyptian aircraft last fall in order to arrest terrorists who had taken the passengers of an Italian ship hostage gives a good idea of what the authors of this unlawful document, designed to apply U.S. domestic legislation to the whole world, have in mind.

They intended to "relieve" Egypt and Italy of those under arrest and convey them to the United States for trial there. The international scandal this produced is well known to people. But, obviously, the United States has not drawn any conclusions from this. Some people there are clearly champing at the bit. In the guise of "combating terrorism," the Washington "hawks" intend to openly pursue a policy of state terrorism and to arrogate to themselves the "right" to carry out unchecked strikes abroad against organizations and persons that, in Washington's judgement, can be charged with "terrorist activity." This is nothing less than open international banditry.

It is possible to wage effective struggle against international terrorism only in conditions where international law is respected and in a situation whereby all interested states cooperate -- which the Soviet Union has always advocated. This, however, obviously does not suit the United States. It is no secret, after all, that thousands of criminals from among former Nazis and their accomplices guilty of mass terror in Hitler-occupied territory, terrorists like the Brazinskases, who killed a Soviet stewardess, and numerous terrorist gangs -- ranging from the "Jewish Defense League" to Cuban "gusanos" and Nicaraguan "contras" and from Sikh extremists to dushmans and National Union for the Total Independence of Angola bandits trained in the United States -- find shelter on that country's territory.

The peoples of the world demand that the United States end the policy of state terrorism. It has no more place in a civilized society than the attempts to "legalize," by means of the bill recently adopted by the U.S. Senate, unconcealed attempts by Washington's "neoglobalists" to interfere in the affairs of other states and peoples in the guise of "combating terrorists."

PRAVDA ON WHITE HOUSE 'MACHIAVELLIANISM'

[Text] Moscow March 7 TASS -- "In present-day conditions Machiavellianism is perhaps more than anything akin to the conduct of the White House. It is there that the end justifies any means and that they ignore the basic morals for the sake of propelling the arms race," PRAVDA said today.

"Take, for example, the President's recent address to the nation, which aimed to sell another increase in the military budget. 'The Russians' were mentioned there nearly 30 times as a bogey. But since the bogeyman of the 'Soviet threat' apparently does no longer work, the writers of the address let themselves go, blasting the previous administration for what they described as almost total disregard for the Pentagon's concerns and even for what they called 'disarming' America.

"The prohibited technique drew immediate reaction from outraged Jimmy Carter in an interview with THE NEW YORK TIMES. The former president demonstrated convincingly enough that the present occupant of the White House is, softly speaking, at odds with facts. And the facts are that the previous administration saw a 'steady' increase in spending and installed five of the seven Trident missiles now at sea. Besides, Carter recalled, almost all strategic nuclear weapon programs were started by Presidents Ford and Nixon and carried on by him.

"As far as 'threat estimates' of 'Soviet military progress' are concerned, 'the Commander in Chief (the President) generally gets what he wants, and if the goal is to rapidly escalate the American defense budgets, then those are the kind of estimates he will get', Carter said. That really hit the nail on the head."

"We aren't to judge who of the present or former American leaders has more 'merits' for fuelling the arms race which has made the United States into a locomotive of militarism. A queer kind of 'competition' this is, too. Resembles stone-age mentality very much."

OVCHINNIKOV REVIEWS U.S. ROLE IN PHILIPPINES

[From the "International Panorama" program presented by Vsevolod Ovchinnikov -- read by announcer]

[Text] In order to get more dollars to give to the contras, the politicians of Washington cynically make themselves out to be enthusiastic supporters of democratic freedoms and political pluralism in Nicaragua, as if these same Yankees had not propped up the bloody Somoza dictatorship with their bayonets for more than 40 years. The U.S. drew away from their puppet only at the last moment, but did not manage to replace him with another: The revolutionary upsurge of the Nicaraguan people was too high.

But in other countries the imperialist circles of the United States have changed horses more than once: that is, they have got rid of excessively hateful and discredited figures. THE NEW YORK TIMES gives a whole list of such examples: Syngman Rhee in South Korea, Ngo Dinh Diem in South Vietnam, and finally Duvalier in Haiti. But never before, the paper notes has the United States come out so frankly and openly for the removal of the leader of an allied state as was done with Marcos in the Philippines.

This island state, at the juncture of the Pacific and Indian oceans, is of huge importance for the U.S. strategists. The two largest military base outside the United States are there: Subic Bay and Clark Field. To move these bases would cost the Pentagon $8 billion. For that reason the serious economic and political crisis which has hit the country worried Washington. They were afraid that the growth of unemployment, the huge foreign debt, and the rampant corruption would cause an explosion of discontent which could get out of control and take on an anti-American character. Given this, Washington considered it more advantageous not to support the ruling regime, but to destabilize it. Marcos was forced to hold presidential elections on February 7th. Hordes of American observers came to monitor them. At the same time, a U.S. squadron led by the aircraft carrier Enterprise approached the Philippines. Two thousand marines were deployed from Okinawa, plus 300 Green Berets -- instructors on crushing mass demonstrations. The master of the White House dispatched to Manila his personal representative Habib -- the same man who, at another time, organized a political cover for the landing of U.S. Marines in Lebanon.

But that was not all. As soon as the results of the voting became known, the U.S. Senate adopted a special resolution to declare them invalid. Just imagine some foreign country refusing to recognize the results of the presidential elections in the United States, citing the example of the Watergate scandal! Aquino called on her supporters to exercise civil disobedience. The country seemed to be on the threshold of civil war. And then suddenly Defense Minister Enrile and Chief of the General Staff Ramos came out against Marcos. They called on the Armed Forces to join the opposition. It is noteworthy that first to respond to this were units of the Philippines Air Force and Navy stationed at the U.S. bases. And it was there, the Pengagon chief admitted, that the helicopters of the rebels, which played a decisive role in the course of events, were fuelled and equipped.

In the opinion of many observers the revolt of the military was, to all appearances, inspired by directors across the ocean in the first place in order to change the balance of forces sharply in favor of Aquino, to hasten the fall of Marcos, and to avoid a civil war with unforeseeable consequences. Secondly, to use the participation of the military in the new government as a counterbalance which would restrain Aquino from actions which are undesirable for the United States. There are already signs of such pressure on her in the question of the release of political prisoners.

The new government is promised American aid. But generous promises are accompanied by demands: to prolong the agreement on U.S. bases after 1991, and to hand the state sector over the American corporations to tear to pieces. The future will show whether the hopes of the Filipinos for positive changes in their internal life and for a more independent foreign policy line by the country will be justified.

Meanwhile, a new theme is being sung by American propaganda: The United States, they claim, played a positive role in removing repressive regimes in Haiti and the Philippines from power. They talk about the desirability of changing the furniture in Chile too; an instructive lesson for Chon Tu-Hwan in South Korea. And it is timely to recall the price paid for its pro-American orientation by the Sadat regime in Egypt.

CONGRESSMEN SUPPORT DISARMAMENT APPEAL

[Text] Washington March 11 TASS -- A group of prominent American senators and representatives have expressed their support for the appeal by the leaders of six countries -- Argentina, India, Mexico, Tanzania, Sweden and Greece -- to undertake concrete steps towards preventing an arms race in outer space and stopping it on Earth.

Senator Paul Simon, Representatives Tom Downey, Jim Leach and Barkley Bedell, at a news conference here, presented the letter addressed by the leaders of the six countries who earlier signed the "Delhi Declaration" to General Secretary of the CPSU Central Committee Mikhail Gorbachev and U.S. President Ronald Reagan.

The struggle for the elimination of the nuclear menace, said Rep. Downey, is a responsibility of every man on Earth. He highly assessed the latest steps and proposals by the Soviet Union which has been observing its unilateral moratorium on all nuclear blasts from August last year, and stated its readiness to agree on corresponding compliance procedures, including on-site verification.

Downey observed with regret at the news conference that the administration refuses to heed the opinion of U.S. Congress which calls for a resumption of talks leading to a comprehensive ban on nuclear weapons tests. In his opinion, it is the absence of political will on the part of the White House, rather than technical problems connected with verification, which stand in the way of the cessation of nuclear testing.

Everything must be done to preserve peace, said Sen. Simon. A total ban on nuclear testing is one of the steps, possible already today, towards this goal. The senator noted that verification problems are no longer a roadblock to the conclusion of an accord in the light of the latest Soviet proposals. In order to achieve at least a temporary ban on nuclear tests, he said, the president only has to lift his telephone receiver and give a call to the Kremlin.

The problem of ending nuclear tests is the question of human survival, said Rep. Bedell.

The congressmen and other participants in the news conference paid tribute to the memory of Olof Palme, an outstanding political figure who was Sweden's prime minister, slain in the evening of February 28, on the days of the signing of the letter by the leaders of the six states.

Sweden's ambassador to the United States Wilhelm Wachtmeister told the news conference that the Swedish Government remains committed to Palme's efforts to eliminate the nuclear threat.

TASS DECRIES HABIB'S CENTRAL AMERICA POST

[Excerpts] Washington, 7 Mar (TASS) -- Today President Reagan appointed Philip Habib as the special representative of the U.S. President in Central America. Habib will replace Harry Shlaudeman.

Habib has long been known as a clever specialist in 'diplomatic cover-ups' of Washington's foreign policy adventures and those of its allies in various parts of the world.

The White House is trying to present Habib's appointment as proof of its desire to seek "diplomatic paths" to a settlement of the crisis in Central America, especially as regards Nicaragua. But the administration's hypocrisy is evident. Thus, on Reagan's instructions, the new special representative of the U.S. President in Central America will to go El Salvador next week to discuss the new 'proposals' recently put forward by El Salvador's President Duarte. These amount to putting unacceptable demands on the Nicaraguan authorities, and, in effect, place the CIA executioners from the "contra" units on a par with the legitimate government of that country.

President Reagan himself, speaking to newsmen after Habib's appointment, did not even try to conceal the fact that the administration's main task is to over-throw the Nicaraguan Government by force. "Our diplomatic efforts," he said, "must be accompanied by increased pressure" on Nicaragua. He said the administration's request for more aid to the "contras" "must be approved."

CHALLENGER TRAGEDY RESULT OF 'FEVERISH HASTE'

[Text] New York March 9 TASS -- The tragedy of the reusable space shuttle Challenger has been a direct consequence of feverish haste in the implementation of the space shuttle programme.

This conclusion follows from statements by American astronauts accusing the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for an excessively busy schedule of launching orbital spaceships, which jeopardized the security and the very life of their crew members. As is known, the launchings of spaceships under the shuttle programme were carried out according to a tight schedule for the sake of implementing plans for a militarisation of outer space and in particular in answer to the demands of the Pentagon, which uses the spaceships for placing miscellaneous military cargoes into a near-earth orbit.

It is expected that Giffen will hold negotiations at the Ministry of Foreign Trade and the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of the USSR.

U.S. TO BUILD TEST FACILITY FOR ABM WEAPONS

LD102123 Moscow TASS in English 2042 GMT 10 Mar 86

[Text] Washington March 10 TASS -- The defense NEWS BULLETIN reports that the U.S. Defense Department is going to spend about 10.3 million dollars in fiscal 1987 on the construction of a number of facilities to test advanced weapons which are to be used in the large-scale partially space-based ABM system. According to the bulletin, 4.2 million dollars will be expended on the construction of a testing site at the Edwards Air Force Base in California, where kinetic weapons are going to be tested.

REPORT ON 11TH TRIAL LAUNCH OF MX MISSILE

[Text] San Francisco March 9 TASS -- The eleventh trial launching of an intercontinental ballistic missile "MX" has been made from the Vandenberg Air Base, California. The testing, as a spokesman for the U.S. Air Force said, has been a success. The launching was made in conditions most close to combat ones from a hardened silo of an intercontinental ballistic missile "Minuteman". The missile was fitted out with nine uncharged MI-21 [as received] warheads. The creation and deployment of first-strike MX missiles is the cornerstone of the massive program for the so-called "rearmament of America" declared by President Reagan.

ARKHIPOV TO ARRIVE ON OFFICIAL VISIT 15 MARCH

HK110352 Hong Kong AFP in English 0319 GMT 11 Mar 86

[Text] Beijing, March 11 (AFP) -- Soviet First Deputy Premier Ivan Arkhipov is to arrive here Saturday on an official visit aimed at boosting commercial, scientific and technological cooperation with China, a Soviet diplomat said Tuesday.

"We expect Mr Arkhipov on March 15," said a spokesman of the Soviet Embassy's trade section. The spokesman indicated that the visit would last about 10 days, but said, "the exact length of his stay will depend on how his talks go," with the Chinese.

Mr Arkhipov is to lead the Soviet delegation at the first session of a joint commission on economic matters, trade, and science and technology which was set up last year.

The deputy premier, who visited Beijing in December 1984, remains the most senior Soviet official to have come here since the 1960's.

SELSKAYA ZHIZN ON PRC DECISION ON FARM PROBLEMS

PM110900 Moscow SELSKAYA ZHIZN in Russian 6 Mar 86 p 4

[TASS report: "Document on Work in the Chinese Countryside"]

[Text] Beijing, 5 Mar -- A CPC Central Committee and PRC State Council document on the organization of work in the countryside in 1986 has been published here. It points out that the implementation of the course of further intensifying the development of agriculture as the basis of the entire national economy will be continued. The determining factors in ensuring the stable development of agriculture in the future will be "constantly improving political directives," the increasing of the peasantry's activeness, and the gradual improvement in production conditions in the countryside.

It follows from the document that in the current year it is intended to conduct work in the agricultural sphere to deepen the reform, which has "still by no means reached the planned goal." Stress will be laid on measures intended to increase the activeness of grain producrs, since last year showed that peasants often produce more profitable crops and products to the detriment of grain production. Thus, it is planned to reduce the proportion of grain procured on contracts between peasants and the state (as is well known, individual peasant farms have become the basis of agricultural production in China), thereby increasing the proportion of grain purchases at commercial prices. At the same time it is planned to expand deliveries of chemical fertilizers and give preference to grain farms when granting credits.

The document contains the recommendation that plowland be handed over to "specialized farms of front-ranking crop farmers" on contractual terms with a view to "promoting the development of large-scale crop farming over large areas."

BATMONH ADDRESSES SOVIET PEOPLE ON CPSU CONGRESS

LD020029 Moscow Domestic Service in Russian 1900 GMT 1 Mar 86

["Radio address" by Jambyn Batmonh, general secretary of the Mongolian People's Revolutionary Party Central Committee and chairman of the Presidium of the Great People's Hural; recorded in Mongolian with superimposed Russian translation]

[Text] Dear Soviet friends: The delegation of the Mongolian People's Revolutionary Party [MPRP], which is taking part in the work of the 27th CPSU Congress, conveys to all Soviet people cordial greetings and best wishes from Mongolian Communists and from all the working people of Mongolia.

The 27th CPSU Congress is one of the greatest political events of our time. The political report of the CPSU Central Committee, presented by Comrade Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev, made an indelible impression on the representatives of Mongolian Communists. It is an outstanding document of creative Marxism-Leninism. It analyzes thoroughly and comprehensively the true reality of the contemporary world and it discloses impressive tasks for the acceleration of the country's socioeconomic development on the basis of scientific-technological progress. A major position in the report is assigned to questions concerning the safeguarding of peace and security and to the implementation of the wide-ranging program for the elimination of nuclear armaments so that humanity will enter the 21st century without weapons of mass destruction.

This would mean a radical turn in international life toward a course of dialogue, peace, and cooperation. The report by Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev and the very important program documents which were submitted for discussion by the congress provide clear answers to the most burning questions of modern times which are worrying all humanity today. They bear a powerful fund of optimism and humanism, and they will undoubtedly serve as a reliable guideline for all peoples of our planet.

Dear friends: On 1 March the working people of Mongolia mark the 65th anniversary of the creation of the MPRP. The MPRP is now a political force that is mature and monolithic in an ideological and organizational respect, and which stands stalwartly on the positions of Marxism-Leninism. The whole course of the development and coming into being of our party and the people's state which has been traveled serves as confirmation that fraternal friendship and comprehensive cooperation with the great Soviet people and its Communist Party have been, are, and will be a very important revolutionary gain of our people, a primary guarantee of the independence and sovereignty of the Mongolian People's Republic (MPR) and the foundation of its further dynamic development.

For 65 years we have been unfailingly together with the Soviet Communists and with the Soviet people, both in labor and in combat. Our mutual relations are permeated with deep mutual trust and fraternal interest in each other's successes. They are now distinguished by their growing dynamism and scope. The long term program for economic and scientific-technological cooperation between the MPR and the USSR for the period up to the year 2000 opens up a qualitatively new stage in our interaction. All this creates and strengthens the firm foundation, supported by which the working people of the MPR look to the future with optimism.

The MPR is today preparing for the 19th MPRP Congress, which is to outline new and more complex boundaries of socialist construction, in an atmosphere of growing labor and political activity among the working people.

In conclusion, I want to wish all Soviet people and the whole multinational family of peoples of the USSR new and great successes in the implementation of the plans of the 27th CPSU Congress and new feats in the name of happiness and prosperity, in the name of peace and socialism.

JAPANESE TOWN OPPOSES U.S. MILITARY COMPLEX

LD101116 Moscow TASS in English 1105 GMT 10 Mar 86

DRA'S KARMAL HOLDS PRESS CONFERENCE IN MOSCOW

[Text] Moscow March 1 TASS -- "From the time of the October Revolution to the present days, when the 27th CPSU Congress is being held, the whole of mankind has had the opportunity to see for itself that the Soviet Union is consistent fighter for peace and the independence of peoples", it was stated by Babrak Karmal, general secretary of the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan, chairman of the Revolutionary Council of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan. He spoke today at the press centre of the 27th CPSU Congress. "The Soviet Government has always come out for freeing the peoples of the world from exploitation, for the development of states along the road of democracy and social progress".

"The historic treaty of friendship between Afghanistan and Soviet Russia was signed 65 years ago. Our friendship, illumined by the Great October Revolution, shines for us, Afghans, like a sun of freedom. After the April Revolution it has acquired a genuinely brotherly nature".

"Despite the undeclared war the working people of Afghanistan under the leadership of the only organised patriotic force in the country -- the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan — have achieved during the past few years considerable successes in the economic, political, cultural and social fields. The party's ranks have grown ten-fold. The party's activities have the support of workers, peasants, representatives of the religious and other sections of the country's population. The new political system created by the revolution is operating with mounting effect".

"The foreign policy of the DRA is a policy of peace. We have strong motives for that", Babrak Karmal stressed. "It is only in a peaceful situation that it is possible to create a democratic society and make one's people happy. But the imperialist forces are pursuing an aggressive policy, placing mankind on the brink of nuclear war. It is our internationalist duty to struggle for peace in every part of the world".

"The same forces are threatening the Republic's security. An amazing and surprising shortsightedness is being displayed by the ruling circles of Pakistan, which is becoming a victim of the aggressive policy of the United States as a result of which it is a vigorous participant in the undeclared war against the DRA. By its substance Iran's course is hostile to our revolution. To our profound regret socialist China too is pursuing a shortsighted policy in respect of the people of Afghanistan. We all must search for ways leading to mutual understanding. The situation around Afghanistan can be normalized only by way of political talks", Babrak Karmal stated.

[TASS International Service in Russian at 1735 GMT on 1 Marchdds the following: We are prepared to show flexibility in the course of these talks, Babrak Karmal stressed. However, Babrak Karmal stressed, we shall not enter into any compromise with those who are in the service of the CIA, who are organizing mass murders on the territory of our country, and who mock people, destroy factories, schools, hospitals, and houses.

[Those who arrived in the camp of the counterrevolution as a result of deceit are another matter. The path to compromise is open with such people. In the past 2-3 months about 30,000 former bandits have laid down their weapons and crossed over to the revolutionary government's side.]

KARMAL COMMENTS ON JOINT FRIENDSHIP TIES

LD051931 Moscow Television Service in Russian 1515 GMT 5 Mar 86

[Interview with Babrak Karmal, General Secretary of PDPA [People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan] Central Committee and chairman of Afghan Revolutionary Council, by Farid Seyful-Mulyukov, from the "CPSU Congress Diary" program; date and place not given; recorded; Karmal in Dari with superimposed Russian translation read by Seyful-Mulyukov]

[Text] [Question] Comrade Babrak Karmal, the work of our congress is drawing to a close. You have been present in the Kremlin Palace of Congresses every day; we heard your outstanding and interesting speech. At the congress, a powerful voice rang out in favor of protecting the sovereignty of Democratic Afghanistan against imperialist armed interference and in favor of a political settlement in Afghanistan. How, on the whole, do you assess the work of the congress of Lenin's party? Go ahead.

[Karmal] We are pleased to note that the Political Report presented at the 27th Congress by Comrade Gorbachev expressed firm support for the struggle of the Afghan people to strengthen their freedom and independence against imperialist aggression. We will never forget the selfless friendly help of the Soviets, with which Afghanistan signed a treaty of friendship as far back as 65 years ago. The memory of this will be handed down from generation to generation.

The great Lenin witnessed the birth of our friendship. Our predecessors bequeathed to us the following: In order to maintain the freedom and independence of Afghanistan, always stick with Russia, and then no force in the world will be able to crush our proud people's freedom. After the victory of the April Revolution, friendship between the Afghan and Soviet peoples took on a truly fraternal character. We consider the Soviet Union's position on protecting the sovereignty of Afghanistan, which was reflected so precisely and clearly in the documents of the 27th CPSU Congress, as a decisive reply to all the intrigues of the aggressive forces of imperialism and reaction. The working people of Afghanistan are deeply grateful and thankful to the homeland of Lenin for this internationalist help.

The forum of Soviet Communists is of particular significance for all peoples who are waging a struggle for their national and social liberation. Participation in the congress of Lenin's party is for us an invaluable school of genuine patriotism and internationalism, the school of the construction of a new society.

[Question] Thank you. I would like to ask you another question, Comrade Babrak Karmal. The Soviet people know well that the leadership of the DRA has been carrying out in the last few months very wide-ranging measures to expand the social basis of people's power in your country. What is the meaning and aim of these important measures?

[Karmal] A revolution is only worth something if it can defend itself. I used these words of the great Lenin in my speech at the 27th Congress. It is clear that a revolution can only defend itself if it has broad social support on the part of the working masses. The April Revolution in Afghanistan went through difficult stages in its advancing development. Over these years we have learned much. Profound changes have also taken place among the Afghan people themselves. Guided by the rich experience of the October Revolution, the experience of revolutions in other countries and taking into account the national, socioeconomic features of Afghanistan, we have been able to create a broad national front for the protection of the gains of the April Revolution. At the head of this revolutionary proces- stands the PDPA.

Despite the fierce war declared on our democratic Republic by the forces of imperialism and reaction, with each day the social basis of people's power is expanding.

The front for the defense of the revolution comprises broad layers of the population, workers, peasants and artisans. We must also have the support of all tribes and the clergy so as not to repeat the mistakes of the first stage of the April Revolution when these forces turned out to be in the power of hostile propaganda.

The new political system born in April 1978 is functioning with increasing effectiveness. Elections of people's representatives to local organs of power are taking place, the ranks of the mass public organisations and the national patriotic front are growing. We have achieved palpable successes in carrying out the land and water reform and other social and economic transformations in Afghanistan.

However, taking account of the experience of the work of the 27th CPSU Congress, we must constantly assess our work critically. We know that we are faced with very much more to do to defend the gains of the April Revolution and the building of a new Afghanistan (?for the right to) freedom, peace and social progress.

AFGHANISTAN CONDEMNS UK OVER ABDUL HAQ VISIT

["DRA Protest to Great Britain" -- TASS headline]

[Text] Kabul, 10 Mar (TASS) -- The British charge d'affaires in the DRA has been summoned to the Afghan Ministry of Foreign Affairs where he was handed a note of protest, according to BAKHTAR. According to pronouncements by British officials and reports by British press, the protest states, Abdul Haq, one of the ringleaders of the Afghan counterrevolution arrived in London a few days ago at the invitation of the British Foreign Office.

It follows from reports that the bandit, who is being passed off as the "representative of Afghan resistance," will be received by high-ranking British Government officials including Prime Minister Thatcher and Geoffrey Howe, secretary for foreign and commonwealth affairs.

The note continues that Lady Young, minister of state at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, on behalf of the British Government expressed support for the activities of this killer who, as he himself admits is responsible for the explosion in the Kabul International Airport, bombardment of population centers, and killing many peaceful inhabitants.

The London reception of the Afghan bandit, wide coverage of his libelous pronouncements by the press, as well as attacks by officials against independent Afghanistan and its friend the USSR, which renders internationalist aid to the DRA, the protest stresses, are direct interference in DRA internal affairs and a gross violation of all norms of the international law.

The DRA Ministry of Foreign Affairs resolutely condemns the acts of Britain directed at interference and further exacerbation of the situation around Afghanistan and expresses its protest in connection with this. Such a policy cannot assist in strengthening peace and security in the region and in the world, as it cannot assist in improving relations between the two countries. The DRA Ministry of Foreign Affairs demands that the British Government stop its provocative activities immediately. Otherwise, the whole responsibility for the consequences of these activities will lie with the British side.

REPORTAGE ON DEVELOPMENTS IN PHILIPPINES

U.S. Congressional Visit

[From "The World Today" program presented by Eduard Mnatsakonov]

[Text] As has already been reported, Corazon Aquino, the president of the Philippines, today swore in 17 ministers of the new government. The formation of her cabinet may be said to be almost complete. The Central Committee of the Philippines Communist Party has expressed support for the new government. At the same time, a letter from the Communist Party Central Committee points out that Philippines Communists will expose any attempts on the part of the new administration to form a bloc with American imperialism. There are many visitors from the United States of America to the Philippines today. A delegation from the U.S. Congress is also paying a visit. The delegation conveyed to Aquino an invitation to visit Washington and speak to the U.S Congress. If Aquino accepts the invitation, the leader of the U.S. delegation declared, this will persuade the majority of members of Congress to back up an increase in military and financial aid to the Philippines.

'Strings' to Aid Attached

[Text] Manila March 9 TASS -- New strings are being attached by the U.S. Administration on economic aid to the Philippines. Well-known Philippine political news analyst Theodoro Valencia writes in the PHILIPPINES DAILY EXPRESS that one could trace some concrete thoughts in a multitude of general and vague statements on the future of American-Philippine relations, which were made by chairman of the subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs Stephen Solarz. The American congressman noted that the Corazon Aquino government will not get additional economic aid from the United States if it does not elaborate a plan of "fundamental reforms" of the set-up of the country. In other words, writes Theodoro Valencia, the United States continues conducting the "carrot-and-stick" policy towards the Philippines.

Audience Rejects Aid

[TASS report: "'Aid' Will Be Given"]

[TExt] Manila, 8 Mar -- Stephen Solarz, chairman of the U.S. Congress House of Representatives Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs, speaking here at Manila University, announced the U.S. Administration's intention to substantially increase its military aid to the Philippines. Consistent in its anticommunist spirit, the congressman's speech abounded in appeals to the new Philippine Administration to develop a broad offensive, with U.S. support, against the positions of left-wing democratic forces in the country. In this connection, the U.S. spokesman did not conceal the fact that Washington's main concern is still to maintain the U.S. military and strategic presence in the Philippines. As is well known, the largest U.S. naval and Air Force bases abroad are located here -- at Subic Bay and Clark Field. The U.S. legislator's statements met with indignation among the student and lecturer audience. Near the building where Solarz was speaking, a mass student demonstration was held under the slogans "No to American interference in Philippines internal affairs!" and "Yankees, go home!"

U.S. PRESSURES ITALY INTO SDI PARTICIPATION

[Text] Rome, 9 Mar (TASS) -- Under pressure from Washington, the Italian Government has given the green light to participation by the country's industrial companies and firms in Reagan's "star wars" program. A decision was taken on this at a meeting of a special international committee for the study of this question headed by Italian prime minister Bettino Craxi. In the opinion of the committee, participation in the Strategic Defense Initiative can supposedly "guarantee technological and scientific benefits" to Italian industry.

Italy has thus become the third Western European country, after Great Britain and the FRG, to support the Pentagon's plans for the creation of space-strike weapons. But Washington is not slackening its pressure on Italy, nor on the other West European allies, in order to draw them even more deeply into their militarist preparations. As the newspaper L'UNITA points out today, the United States is exerting pressure with the aim of not only achieving the actual participation of foreign companies and firms in SDI, but also the political support of West European countries, that is, the signing of governmental treaties with the allies. "The United States is rushing its allies and is waiting for West European governments to join its project," the agency ANSA notes, commenting on the course of talks in the Pentagon of an authoritative Italian delegation which has arrived in the United States, comprising high-ranking representatives of ministries and a number of state and private companies.

ISSUES IN SPAIN'S NATO REFERENDUM VIEWED

[From "The World Today" program presented by Igor Kodrin]

[Text] Across the Pyrenees in neighboring Spain today is the last day of campaigning before the nationwide referendum on whether the country should belong to NATO. It has taken the Socialist government 3 and 1/2 years to keep its election promise and call this referendum.

You already know that the leaders of the Spanish Workers' Socialist Party have turned from being fierce opponents of Spain's presence in the North Atlantic bloc into no less zealous defenders of Atlanticism. How can such a metamorphosis be explained? The leaders of the Socialists say that they were forced to review their convictions by the experience of government and the practice of being in NATO and the Common Market. They maintain that membership in the alliance supposedly strengthen's Spain's position and gives it a number of advantages. What are these? A guarantee of territorial neutrality, representation in all important international forums, participation in technical developments within the framework of the EEC, technical know-how on defense planning, and greater independence from the United States.

Those who support Spain's leaving NATO -- communists and members of leading trade union organization, anti-NATO committees, and of public organizations -- reply to this with mass meetings and demonstrations. They have their counterarguments. Every year Washington supplies large amounts of money to maintain the Spanish Armed Forces and train Spanish servicemen. Four bases, along with other military installations on Spanish territory, belong to the United States. The purchase of 72 modern aircraft from the United States is now in progress. Also, Spain is taking an ever more active part in European defense projects. In addition, along with Britain, the FRG and Italy, Spain is developing for NATO a costly European fighter. NATO is a threat to our security; NATO brings extra spending and a heightening of the economic crisis and increases in unemployment; these are things being said by millions of Spaniards who are calling for the country to leave the North Atlantic bloc and for U.S. bases on their land to be abolished.

How will the referendum end? The latest public opinion poll shows that the advantage, a fairly insignificant one, lies with those calling for a break with NATO. This is why the ruling party and members of the government are now throwing their last resources and means into the battle, including television, radio, and the press, in an attempt, at this decisive moment, to change people's convictions or maybe to scare the ditherers with the prospect of an unstable situation and so tip the balance in their own favor.

It should not be forgotten, comrades, that the call to remain in NATO is coming from a ruling party enjoying mass support, that the call to retain membership in NATO is coming from a government whose popularity among the population remains, as before, quite high.

Dismay and embarrassment can be observed at NATO headquarters in Brussels, for such a thing has never happened before in the history of the alliance. Spain, the last to join the bloc and its 16th member, is holding a referendum in whith the antiwar and peace-loving forces might win a victory. What an example for the rest of Western Europe! The bloc's secretary general Lord Carrington acknowledged a few days ago: For us this would be a political blow. People might come to think that it is not in their interests to be in NATO. The lord, as is said, hit the nail on the head. Millions of Spaniards have long since been thinking precisely that way. But let me repeat that the struggle ahead is a tough one. Spain is divided into two huge opposed camps. To whom will victory fall? The reply to that question will come on 12 March, which is an ordinary working day. Incidentally, the organizers are promising to be able to announce the result of the referendum just 1 and 1/2 hours after the voting stations close.

U.S. SEEKS TO DRAG SPAIN INTO MILITARIST ORBIT

LD080048 Moscow in Spanish to Spain 2200 GMT 6 Mar 86

[Yuriy Konstantinov commentary]

[Text] The U.S. aircraft carrier Saratoga, which is on its way to the Libya coast, has arrived in the port of Malaga. Together with the aircraft carriers Coral Sea and America, it will take part in the provocative U.S. exercises near the Libyan coast.

These exercises will be the third such exercises since the beginning of the year. Our observer Yuriy Konstantinov writes:

The U.S. militarists have embarked upon further provocative exercises in the Mediterranean. As a NATO member, Spain has to extend a (?welcome) to the [word indistinct] guests. [Words indistinct] which the Moncloa administration publicly rejects. [Words indistinct] the U.S. submarines and aircraft-carriers with nuclear missiles on board are entering Spanish ports more frequently. For example, last year in spite of the energetic protests by the public, the Rota base was visited by some 10 U.S. missile-carriers from the 6th Fleet in the Mediterranean. U.S. vessels with nuclear (?weapons) on board also entered Cadiz. These visits continue despite the fact that, as is well known, on more than one occasion the Moncloa administration said that it would never permit the deployment, storing, or transportation of nuclear weaposn weapons.

[Words indistinct] for them the antinuclear statements by the Moncloa administration are one thing, and the interests of the Pentagon and the White House another. Their objective is to drag Spain into the orbit of their militarist preparations, and, in short, install lethal nuclear weapons in this country. This is shown by Washington's plans to modernize the base at Rota [words indistinct] create a new [word indistinct] military base for the U.S. Rapid Deployment Forces. Meanwhile, the Pentagon uses Spanish ports, among them Malaga which is where the aircraft carrier Saratoga is.

PORTUGAL'S SOARES ON SOVIET, PORTUGUESE RELATIONS

[From the "Vremya" newscast]

[Text] In Lisbon today the inauguration of former leader of the Socialist Party Mario Soares as president of the Republic of Portugal, took place. In an interview for Soviet television, Mario Soares said:

[Begin recording in Portuguese with superimposed Russian translation] Relations between Portugal and the Soviet Union are good. As minister of foreign affairs, I had the honor of taking part in the restoration of diplomatic relations between our countries. I followed the progress of the 27th CPSU Congress with great attention and I consider that this event is outstanding on a world scale. I received with satisfaction the full text of the Political Report to the congress delivered by General Secretary of the CPSU Central Committee Gorbachev. I shall study it most attentively.

One of my principle wishes is that Portugal should, as a peace-loving country, play an active role in the fight for peace and should support all efforts by the superpowers, including the Soviet Union, in favor of universal peace. [end recording]

SOVIET ENVOY ON 'POSITIVE REACTION' TO CYPRUS PROPOSAL

NC100802 Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English 8 Mar 86 p 3

[Text] The Soviet Union is in touch with the parties involved in the Cyprus problem over its January proposals on the principles and ways on which a Cyprus settlement should be based, the Soviet Ambassador in Nicosia, Mr Sergey Astavin, has stated. Mr Astavin was speaking yesterday at a press conference in Nicosia on the results of the 27th Congress of the Communist Party of the USSR, which ended this week in Moscow. He said the importance of the Soviet proposals was revealed by the fact that for two months now they had been "a subject of discussion."

The Soviet envoy underlined the "wholehearted positive reaction" of the Greek Cypriot side to the Soviet proposals. He didn't mention anything on the Turkish Cypriot reaction.

Invited to comment on the Turkish Cypriot leader Rauf Denktas' statement that the Turkish side considered the Soviet proposals as "an intervention in the internal affairs of Cyprus", the ambassador said: "He (Denktas) hasn't told me that".

He said consultations on the Soviet proposals were being held at governmental, non-governmental and parliamentarian levels and that the interested parties were in touch through diplomatic channels.

Mr Astavin declined to reveal what the next Soviet steps on a Cyprus settlement would be, saying that "if someone enters in many details on a delicate matter, he many times causes damage..." He added: "When the time comes we shall enter in more details".

The Soviet proposals, presented to all parties involved in the Cyprus problem, urged for the reunification of the island under conditions of peace and justice, without foreign troops and installations on the island. It also called for an international conference to be held under the UN aegis in an effort to find a just and viable solution to the protracted Cyprus problem.

The Cyprus Government and the House of Representatives and the Greek Government have welcomed the Soviet initiative but Turkey and the Turkish Cypriot leadership have dismissed it as "having nothing new".

The Soviet Union, Mr Astavin went on, as it was underlined in the congress, supported the activation of collective efforts for finding solutions to the regional conflicts. It supported the settlement of those conflicts through political means. "This also is completely referred to Cyprus", he said. The envoy said the 27th Congress of the CPSU had "been attended by 5,000 representatives from more than 100 nations and nationalities of the USSR and 152 foreign party delegations from 13 countries.

The Communist AKEL [Restorative Party of the Working People] Party was represented in Moscow by a delegation headed by its secretary-general, Mr Ezekias Papaioannou, who during the deliberations held talks with Soviet and other party leaders on the situation in Cyprus. At a meeting there between the communist parties of Cyprus, Greece and Turkey, their leaders Mr Papaioannou, Mr Kharilaos Florakis and Mr Haydar Kutlu, agreed that the Soviet initiative on Cyprus provided the "right international framework for a settlement and which proposed a concrete and realistic solution on the basis of the unity, sovereignty and independence of the Cyprus state and the withdrawal of all foreign troops."

In a joint communique the three Communist Parties took a stand against any kind of intervention in the internal affairs of Cyprus and declared that a solution to the Cyprus problem should safeguard the peaceful, democratic and mutually beneficial co-existence of the Greek and Turkish Cypriot communities.

UK RECEIVES 'ANTI-AFGHAN BANDIT' WITH 'OPEN ARMS'

LD072226 Moscow TASS International Service in Russian 1800 GMT 7 Mar 86

[Text] London, 7 Mar (TASS) -- The British capital is welcoming with open arms one of the chieftains of the anti-Afghan bandit formations, Abdul Haq, who is here as a "guest of the British Government." According to the British Prime Minister's Office, the bandit will be received by Margaret Thatcher next week. Since arriving in Britain, Abdul Haq has made statements boasting that his gangs have destroyed scores of peaceful civilians and organized an explosion at Kabul airport and other acts of terrorism.

There is justified consternation here that such a welcome is being accorded to the chief of bandit formations acting against the legitimate government of Afghanistan with which Britain has official diplomatic relations. It is noted in this connection that in 1985 alone, 4 million pounds sterling was allocated in Pakistan from British treasury as "aid to Afghan refugees." These funds are being used to finance aggressive sallies against Afghanistan.

MURPHY IN MIDDLE EAST TO IMPLEMENT 'REAGAN PLAN'

LD101406 Moscow TASS in English 1306 GMT 10 Mar 86

[Text] Cairo March 10 TASS -- TASS correspondent Aleksandr Bogatyrev reports:

Richard Murphy, U.S. assistant secretary of state, has again arrived on a visit in the Middle East. Together with Vice President George Bush he visited Tunis, then (?made a) stopover in Cairo on his way to Israel and other countries of the region.

The aim of the tour by the American emissary is to galvanise the process of Middle East settlement on the basis of the Reagan plan, which has been resolutely rejected by a majority of Arab states. The Arabs clearly realise that behind the mask of an "American peace-maker" is the aggressor's face.

Progressive Arab circles point out that Washington (?pursues as) its ends the escalation of the Iran-Iraq armed conflict, the worsening of Jordanian-Palestinian relations and inter-Arab differences for the implementation of its aggressive plans in the Middle East, for a broadening and strengthening of U.S. military presence in the Persian Gulf area and the region as a whole.

While representatives of the White House are on a political tour, the "strategic allies" are spinning webs of conspiracies against the Arabs. The U.S. Sixth Fleet and Israeli naval ships engaged in provocative maneuvres outside Libya's shores have trained on the latter's populated localities their missiles and guns. The Zionists enjoying unlimited support from the USA, are sowing death and destruction on the Lebanese soil, hatching plans to launch strikes against Syria, PLO and other progressive forces in that part of the world. The USA and Israel do not conceal their intention to force on the Arabs by means of arms a separate path of Middle East settlement, draw ever new participants into that process so as to be able with their aid and at the expense of the interests of the Arab peoples, above all the Arab people of Palestine, to ensure undivided sway in the Middle East and the Persian Gulf area.

SOVIET ENVOY ON KIDNAPPING OF FRENCH NEWSMEN

NC101305 Beirut Domestic Service in Arabic 1130 GMT 10 Mar 86

[Text] Ambassador Fu'ad al-Turk, secretary general of the Foreign Ministry, received Soviet Charge d'Affaires Yuriy Suslikov at noon today. After the meeting, Suslikov said that the discussions dealt with a number of questions, including the results of the CPSU's 27th congress, the situation in southern Lebanon, and bilateral issues.

When asked about the Vatican initiative to unify positions in Lebanon, Suslikov stated: I believe that all steps taken are useful. Commenting on the abduction of the French television team, Suslikov said: I believe it is most regrettable. In my opinion, the French Government should increase its efforts to free these people.

PRAVDA Publishes New CPSU Statutes

PM071800 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 7 Mar 86 Second Edition pp 8-10

["Statutes of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union Approved by the 27th CPSU Congress" — PRAVDA headline; item bears the notation "Proletarians of All Countries, Unite!" on the left above the headline; notes in brackets indicate variations between final version and the draft version, which was published in a Soviet Union DAILY REPORT supplement dated 5 November 1985]

[Text] The Communist Party of the Soviet Union is the militant and tried and tested vanguard of the Soviet people, uniting on principles of voluntary participation the advanced and most conscious segment of the working class, kolkhoz peasantry, and intelligentsia of the USSR. Founded by V.I. Lenin as the advanced detachment of the working class, the Communist Party has covered a glorious road of struggle and led the working class and the toiling peasants to the victory of the Great October Socialist Revolution and the establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat in our country.

Under the leadership of the Communist Party, the exploiter classes were liquidated in the Soviet Union, and the sociopolitical and ideological unity of the Soviet multinational society was established and is constantly strengthening. Socialism has won full and final victory. The proletarian state has developed into a state of the whole people. The country has entered the stage of developed socialism. [Draft did not have the preceeding sentence]

The CPSU, while remaining in its class essence and ideology the party of the working class, has become the party of the entire people.

The party exists for the people and serves the people. It is the highest form of sociopolitical organization, the nucleus of the political system, and the leading and directing force of Soviet society. The party defines the general prospects of the country's development and ensures scientific leadership of the people's creative activity and gives an organized, planned, and purposeful character to their struggle to reach the final goal — the victory of communism.

In all its activity the CPSU is guided by the Marxist-Leninist teaching and its program, in which the tasks of the systematic and all-round improvement of socialism and of Soviet society's further advance toward communism on the basis of the acceleration of the country's socioeconomic development are defined.

The CPSU builds its work on the basis of strict observance of Leninist norms of party life and the principles of democratic centralism, collectiveness of leadership, the all-round development of intraparty democracy, the creative activeness of Communists, criticism and self-criticism, and broad publicity.

The immutable law of the life of the CPSU is the ideological and organizational unity and monolithic cohesion of its ranks and the high, conscious discipline of all Communists. Any manifestation of factionalism and group activity is incompatible with Marxist-Leninist party principles and party membership. The party rids itself of persons who violate the program and the CPSU Statutes and who compromise by their behavior the lofty title of Communist.

["...The CPSU builds its work on the basis of strict observance of Leninist norms of party life and the principles of democratic centralism, collectiveness of leadership, the all-round development of intraparty democracy, the creative activeness of Communists, criticism and self-criticism, and broad publicity.

["The immutable law of the life of the CPSU is the ideological and organizational unity and monolithic cohesion of its ranks and the high, conscious discipline of all Communists. Any manifestation of factionalism and group activity is incompatible with Marxist-Leninist party principles and party membership. The party rids itself of persons who violate the program and the CPSU Statutes and who compromise by their behavior the lofty title of Communist.

["In all its activity the CPSU is guided by the Marxist-Leninist teaching and its program, in which the tasks of the systematic and all-round improvement of socialism and of Soviet society's further advance toward communism on the basis of the acceleration of the country's socioeconomic development are defined."]

Creatively developing Marxism-Leninism, the CPSU resolutely combats any manifestations of revisionism and dogmatism, which are deeply alien to revolutionary theory.

The Communist Party of the Soviet Union is an integral part of the international communist movement. It is firmly based on tested Marxist-Leninist principles of proletarian, socialist internationalism and actively assists in strengthening the cooperation and cohesion of the fraternal socialist countries, the world system of socialism, and the international communist and workers movement, and displays solidarity [Draft had: "...fraternal socialist countries and in consolidating the world system of socialism and the unity of the international communist and workers movement, and displays solidarity"] with peoples struggling for national and social liberation, against imperialism, and for the preservation of peace.

I. Members of the Party, Their Duties and Rights

1. Any citizen of the Soviet Union who accepts the party program and statutes, who actively participates in the building of communism, who works in a party organization, who fulfills party decisions, and who pays membership dues may be a member of the CPSU.

2. Duties of the party member:

a. To implement firmly and unswervingly the party's general line and directives, explain the CPSU's domestic and foreign policy to the masses, organize the working people to implement it, and promote the strengthening and expansion of the ties between the party and the people;

b. To set an example in labor, protect and augment socialist property, seek persistently to improve production efficiency, to steadily increase labor productivity, to improve output quality, and to introduce into the national economy the achievements of modern science, technology, and advanced experience, improve his qualifications, be a vigorous champion of everything new and progressive, and make the greatest possible contribution to accelerating the country's socioeconomic development;

[Preceeding paragraph read as follows in draft:

["...b. To set an example of a conscientious, creative attitude to labor and high organization and discipline and to protect and augment socialist property — the economic basis of the Soviet social system. To strive persistently to improve production efficiency, steadily increase labor productivity, and introduce the achievements of modern science and technology into the national economy; to improve his qualifications, support and disseminate leading experience, and actively champion everything new and progressive;"]

c. To take an active part in the political life of the country, in the management of state and public affairs, set an example in the execution of civic duty, and actively promote the increasingly full implementation of socialist people's self-management;

d. To master Marxist-Leninist theory, expand his political and cultural horizons, and promote in every possible way the raising of the consciousness and the ideological and moral growth of Soviet people. To wage a resolute struggle against any manifestations of bourgeois ideology, the private ownership mentality, religious prejudices, and other views and customs that are alien to the socialist way of life;

e. To strictly observe the norms of communist morality, to affirm the principle of social justice inherent in socialism, to put public interests above personal interests, to display modesty and decency, sensitivity, and attention toward people, to respond promptly to the working people's demands and needs, and to be truthful and honest to the party and people;

f. To consistently convey to the masses of working people the ideas of proletarian, socialist internationalism and Soviet patriotism, combat manifestations of nationalism and chauvinism, and actively help to strengthen the friendship among the USSR's peoples and fraternal ties with the socialist countries and with the proletarians and working people of the whole world;

g. To further in every possible way the strengthening of the USSR's defense might and to wage a tireless struggle for peace and friendship among the peoples;

h. To strengthen the ideological and organizational unity of the party, to protect the party against the penetration into its ranks of people unworthy of the high title of Communist, to display vigilance, and to keep party and state secrets;

i. To develop criticism and self-criticism, boldly expose shortcomings and work to eliminate them, fight against ostentation, conceit, complacency, and window dressing, decisively rebuff all attempts to suppress criticism, and oppose bureaucratism, parochialism, departmentalism, and any activities prejudicial [Draft had "...ostentation, conceit, complacency, parochialism, departmentalism, and window dressing, decisively rebuff all attempts to suppress criticism, and oppose any activities prejudicial"] to the party and state and report them to the party organs, right up to the CPSU Central Committee;

j. To pursue strictly the party line on the selection of cadres on the basis of their political, professional, and moral qualities. To be implacable in all cases where the Leninist principles of the selection and education of cadres are violated;

k. To observe party and state discipline, equally obligatory for all members of the party. The party has only one discipline and one law for all Communists, irrespective of services or office.

3. The party member has the right:

a. To elect and to be elected to the party organs;

b. To discuss freely at party meetings, conferences, congresses, and party committee sessions and in the party press questions regarding the party's policy and practical activity, submit proposals, and openly express and defend his opinion before the organization adopts a decision;

c. To criticize at party meetings, conferences, congresses, and committee plenums any party organ or any Communist, irrespective of the post he occupies. Persons guilty of suppressing criticism or persecuting others for criticism must be called to strict party account, up to and including expulsion from the ranks of the CPSU;

d. To take part personally in party meetings and bureau and committee sessions when the question of his activity and behavior is being discussed;

e. To address questions, statements, and proposals to any party body, up to and including the CPSU Central Committee, and to demand a reply on the substance of the application.

4. Admission to party membership is carried out exclusively on an individual basis. Workers, peasants, and members of the intelligentsia who are conscious, active, and devoted to the cause of communism are admitted as party members. New members are admitted from the ranks of candidate members with the required length of candidate party service.

Persons who have reached the age of 18 years are admitted to the party. Young people up to the age of 25, inclusive, enter the party only through the All-Union Komsomol.

Procedure for the admission of candidates as party members:

a. Persons to be admitted as party members must produce recommendations from three CPSU members with no less than 5 years' standing in the party who have been acquainted with the candidate in joint production and public work for not less than a year.

Note 1. Members of the All-Union Komsomol entering the party submit the recommendation of the All-Union Komsomol raykom or gorkom, which is equivalent to the recommendation of one party member.

Note 2. Members and candidates for membership in the CPSU Central Committee will refrain from acting as sponsors;

b. The question of admission to the party is discussed and decided by the general meeting of the primary party organization; its decision is deemed to be adopted if not less than two-thirds of the party members present at the meeting voted for it, and comes into force after ratification by the raykom, or, in towns which have no rayon division, by the party gorkom.

The presence of the sponsors is not obligatory during the discussion of admission to the party. Admission to the party takes place, as a rule, at open meetings;

c. Citizens of the USSR who were formerly members of communist and workers parties in other countries are admitted to the CPSU on the basis of rules established by the CPSU Central Committee.

5. Sponsors are responsible to the party organizations for objectively describing the political, professional, and moral qualities of the candidates and give them assistance in ideological and political growth.

6. The length of party service of persons admitted to the party dates from adoption of the decision by the general meeting of the primary party organization admitting the candidate to party membership.

7. The procedure for registering members and candidates for party membership and their transfer from one organization to another is established by appropriate instructions of the CPSU Central Committee.

8. The question of party members and candidates who without valid reason have failed to pay membership dues for 3 months is subject to discussion in the primary party organization. If it is found that a given member or candidate for party membership has in fact lost contact with the party organization, he is then considered struck from the party roll and the primary party organization adopts a decision to that effect and submits it to the party raykom or gorkom for ratification.

9. The party member or candidate member will be made to answer for failure to carry out the duties laid down by the statutes and other offenses, and the following penalties may be imposed on him: public warning, reprimand (severe reprimand), reprimand (severe reprimand) with notation in his report card. The severest form of party punishment is expulsion from the party.

For minor offenses, party educational measures and other means of influence must be applied in the form of comradely criticism, party censure, warning, and instruction.

A Communist who has committed a misdemeanor answers for it in the first instance to the primary party organization. If a Communist is called to party account by a higher organ, the primary party organization is informed of this.

In examining the question of calling [a Communist] to party account, maximum caution and a painstaking examination of the validity of the accusations leveled against the Communist must be ensured.

Not later than a year after the imposition of a penalty on a party member the party organization must hear his report on how he is rectifying the shortcomings he committed.

10. The question of expelling a Communist from the party is decided by a general meeting of the primary party organization. The decision of the primary party organization regarding expulsion from the party is considered adopted when not less than two-thirds of the party members attending the meeting vote for it and enters into force after its ratification by the party raykom or gorkom.

Until the party raykom or gorkom ratifies the decision for expulsion from the CPSU, the party card or candidate's card will be retained by the Communist and he has the right to attend closed party meetings.

Anyone expelled from the party has the right to appeal within a 2-month period to higher party organs, up to and including the CPSU Central Committee.

11. The question of calling to party account the members and candidate members of a union republic Communist Party central committee or party kraykom, obkom, okruzhkom, gorkom, or raykom, and also of the members of the auditing commissions is discussed in primary party organizations, and decisions imposing penalties on them are taken by regular procedure.

[Preceeding paragraph replaces the following two paragraphs in draft:

["...11. The question of calling to party account the members and candidate members of a union republic Communist Party central committee or party kraykom, obkom, okruzhkom, gorkom, or raykom, and also of the members of the auditing commissions is discussed in the primary party organizations.

["The decisions of the party organizations imposing penalties on members and candidate members of these party committees and members of auditing commissions are taken by regular procedure."]

The proposals of the party organizations for expulsion from the CPSU are conveyed to the appropriate party committee of which the Communist in question is a member. Decisions regarding expulsion from the party of members and candidate members of a union republic communist party central committee or party kraykom, obkom, okruzhkom, gorkom, or raykom, and members of the auditing commissions are adopted at the plenum of the appropriate committee by a majority of two-thirds of the votes of its members.

The question of expulsion from the party of a member or candidate member of the CPSU Central Committee or a member of the CPSU Central Auditing Commission is decided by the party congress and, during the period between congresses, by a plenum of the Central Committee by a majority of two-thirds of the members of the CPSU [Draft omits "CPSU"] Central Committee.

12. A party member bears a dual responsibility for violation of Soviet laws — to the state and to the party. Persons committing misdemeanors punishable by criminal proceedings are expelled from the ranks of the CPSU.

13. Appeals of members expelled from the party or penalized by the party and the decisions of the party organizations on expulsion from the party are reviewed by the appropriate party organs not later than 2 months from the date of their receipt.

II. Candidates for Party Membership

14. Persons joining the party undergo a period of candidate service necessary to familiarize them in greater depth with the CPSU Program and Statutes and prepare them to join the party.

The party organization must assist candidates in preparing for CPSU membership and check their personal qualities as reflected in practical actions and in the fulfillment of party and public instructions.

The length of the trial period for a candidate is 1 year.

15. Procedure for candidate admission (individual admission, submission of recommendations, and decision of primary organization on candidate admission and its ratification) is the same as for admission to party membership.

16. On the expiration of the trial period, the primary party organization considers and decides on the admission of the candidate to CPSU membership. Should a candidate fail to prove himself during the trial period and should his personal qualities make him unworthy of CPSU membership, the party organization will adopt a decision refusing him admission to the party and, on ratification of this decision by a party raykom or gorkom, he will cease to be a candidate for CPSU membership.

17. Candidate members of the party participate in all party organization activities and have a consultative vote at party meetings. Candidate members of the party cannot be elected to leading party organs or be delegates to party conferences and congresses.

18. Candidate members of the CPSU pay the same party dues as party members.

III. Organizational Structure of the Party. Intraparty Democracy

19. The guiding principle of the organizational structure and of the life and [Draft had: "...structure and of all the life and"] activity of the party is democratic centralism, which means:

a. Election of all leading party organs, from the lowest to the highest organ;

b. Periodic accountability of party organs to their party organizations and higher organs;

c. Strict party discipline and the subordination of the minority to the majority;

d. The decisions of the higher organs are absolutely binding on lower organs;

e. Collectiveness in the work of all party organizations and leading organs and personal responsibility on the part of each Communist for the fulfillment of his duties and party assignments.

[The preceeding paragraph was not carried in the draft]

20. The party is structured on the territorial-production basis: Primary organizations are formed at the Communist's place of work and are united in rayon, city, and other organizations in a given territory. The organization uniting the Communists of a given territory is the superior organ for all party organizations constituting that organization.

21. All party organizations are autonomous in deciding local matters, provided the decisions are not contrary to party policy.

22. The highest leadership organ of the party organization is: the general meeting or conference (for primary organizations); the conference (for rayon, city, okrug, oblast, and kray organizations); and the congress (for union republic communist parties and the CPSU). The meeting, conference, and congress are quorate if more than half of the members of the party organization or elected delegates are present.

23. The general meeting, conference, or congress elects the bureau or committee, which are the executive organs and guide the entire current work of the party organization.

In the CPSU Central Committee, union republic Communist Party central committees, and party kraykoms, obkoms, okruzhkoms, gorkoms, and raykoms an apparatus is created for current work to organize and verify the execution of party decisions and to assist lower organizations in their activity.

The structure and staff of the party apparatus are determined by the CPSU Central Committee.

24. The election of party organs is by closed (secret) ballot. At meetings in primary and shop organizations with fewer than 15 party members and in party groups the election of secretaries and deputy secretaries of party organizations and party group organizers may take place by open ballot with the consent of the Communists. In these primary organizations delegates to rayon and city party conferences are elected by the same procedure. [Preceding sentence is an addition to draft]

All members of the party have the unrestricted right during elections to reject candidates and criticize them. Each candidacy must be voted on separately. Candidates will be deemed elected if over half of the participants in the meeting, conference, or congress vote for them.

In the election of all party organs from primary organizations to the CPSU Central Committee the principle of the systematic renewal of their composition and of continuity of leadership shall be observed.

25. Members and candidate members of the CPSU Central Committee, union republic Communist Party central committees, and party kraykoms, obkoms, okruzhkoms, gorkoms, and raykoms must, in all their activities, justify the great trust shown in them. If the party committee member or candidate member loses his honor and dignity, he cannot remain in the body of the committee.

The question of the removal of the party committee member or candidate member from the party committee is decided at a plenum of the committee. The decision is considered adopted if in a closed (secret) ballot no less than two-thirds of the party committee members vote for it.

The question of the removal of members of the CPSU Central Auditing Commission and the auditing commissions of local party organizations from those commissions is decided at their sessions under the procedure laid down for members and candidate members of party committees.

26. Free and businesslike discussion of the questions of party policy in the party and in all its organizations is an important [Draft had: "...of party policy in individual party organizations or in the party as a whole is an inalienable right of a party member and an important"] principle of intraparty democracy. Only on the basis of intraparty democracy is it possible to ensure high creative activeness on the part of Communists, open criticism and self-criticism, and firm party discipline, which must be conscious and not mechanical.

Debates on disputed or insufficiently clear questions are possible within the framework of individual organizations or the party as a whole.

Partywide debate is held [Draft had: "...is necessary"]:

a. On the initiative of the CPSU Central Committee, if it finds it necessary to consult the whole party on particular questions of policy.

b. At the proposal of several party organizations of the republican, kray, or oblast level.

[Preceding two paragraphs replace the following three paragraphs from the draft:

["...a. If this necessity is recognized by several party organizations of the oblast or republic level;

["b. If there is no firm majority within the Central Committee on the most important questions of party policy;

["c. If the CPSU Central Committee finds it necessary to consult the whole party on particular questions of policy."]

Broad debates, especially debates on an all-union scale about questions of party policy, must be carried out so as to ensure the free expression of the views of party members and to exclude the possibility of attempts to form factional groupings and split the party. [Draft had: "...form factional groupings, which destroy party unity, and attempts to split the party."]

27. The highest principle of party leadership is collectiveness of leadership — an essential condition for normal activity of party organizations, for the correct education of cadres, and for the development of the activeness and spontaneous activity of Communists and a reliable guarantee against the adoption of willful, subjectivist decisions, against the manifestation of the cult of personality, and against violations of the Leninist norms of party life.

The collectiveness of leadership presupposes personal responsibility for assigned work and constant monitoring of the activity of every party organization and every worker.

[Preceding paragraph replaces the following paragraph from the draft:

["...The collectiveness of leadership does not absolve personnel of personal responsibility for the job entrusted to them."]

28. The CPSU Central Committee, union republic Communist Party central committees, and party kraykoms, obkoms, okruzhkoms, gorkoms, and raykoms systematically inform party organizations about their work and about the implementation of Communists' criticisms and proposals in the period [Draft had: "...about their work in the period"] between congresses and conferences.

An immutable rule for party committees and primary party organizations is also the objective and timely briefing of higher party organs about their own activity and the situation at local level.

[The preceding paragraph is an addition to the draft]

29. For the discussion of the most important party decisions and the elaboration of measures to implement them, as well as the examination of questions of local life, meetings are convened of the aktiv of rayon, city, okrug, oblast, and kray party organizations and union republic communist parties.

30. Standing or temporary commissions and working groups on various questions of party work may be created in party committees, and other forms of involvement of Communists in the activity of party organs on a voluntary basis may also be used.

IV. The Highest Party Organs

31. The supreme organ of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union is the party congress. Regular congresses are convened by the Central Committee at least once every 5 years. The convocation of the party congress and the agenda are announced not less than 1 and 1/2 months before the congress. Out-of-turn (extraordinary) congresses are convened by the party Central Committee on its own initiative or at the request of not less than one-third of the total number of party members represented at the last party congress. Out-of-turn (extraordinary) congresses are convened on 2 months' notice. The congress is considered valid if at least half the total number of party members are represented at it.

The norms for representation at the party congress are laid down by the Central Committee.

32. If the party Central Committee does not convene an out-of-turn (extraordinary) congress within the term specified in Article 31, organizations requesting the convocation of an out-of-turn (extraordinary) congress have the right to form an organizing committee possessing the rights of the party Central Committee to convene an out-of-turn (extraordinary) congress.

33. The congress:

a. Hears and approves the reports of the Central Committee, the Central Auditing Commission, and other central organizations;

b. Reviews, amends, and approves the party program and statutes;

c. Determines the party line on questions of domestic and foreign policy and examines and decides on the most important questions of party and state life and communist building;

d. Elects the Central Committee and the Central Auditing Commission.

34. The Central Committee and the Central Auditing Commission are elected in the composition established by the congress. In the event of the departure of members of the Central Committee, its membership is replenished from among the candidate members of the CPSU Central Committee elected by the congress.

35. The Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union in the period between congresses leads all the activity of the party and of local party organs; selects and places leading cadres; directs the work of central state and public organizations of the working people; creates various organs, institutions, and enterprises of the party and leads their activities; appoints the editorial staff of central papers and journals functioning under its control; and allocates funds from the party budget and monitors its execution.

The Central Committee represents the CPSU in its relations with other parties.

36. The CPSU Central Auditing Commission inspects compliance with the established procedure for the conduct of affairs and work to examine working people's letters, statements, and complaints in central party organs, the correct execution of the party budget, including the payment, receipt, and accounting of members' party dues, and also the financial and economic activity of enterprises and institutions of the CPSU Central Committee.

37. The CPSU Central Committee holds not less than one plenary session every 6 months. Candidate members of the Central Committee attend the sessions of Central Committee plenums with the right of consultative vote.

38. The Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union eects: a Politburo to lead the work of the party between Central Committee plenums and a secretariat to lead current work, mainly in the selection of cadres and organization of the verification of execution. The Central Committee elects a general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee.

39. The Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union organizes the Party Control Committee under the Central Committee.

The Party Control Committee under the CPSU Central Committee:

a. Verifies compliance with party discipline by members and candidate members of the CPSU, calls to account Communists guilty of violating the party program and statutes and party and state discipline, as well as violators of party ethics;

b. Examines appeals against the decisions of the union republic Communist Party central committees and party kraykoms and obkoms on expulsion from the party and on party penalties.

40. In the period between party congresses the CPSU Central Committee may, when necessary, convene an all-union party conference to discuss pressing matters of party policy. The procedure for holding an all-union party conference is determined by the CPSU Central Committee.

V. Republic, Kray, Oblast, Okrug, City, and Rayon Party Organizations

41. The republic, kray, oblast, okrug, city, and rayon party organizations and their committees are guided in their activity by the CPSU Program and Statutes, carry out within the republic, kray, oblast, okrug, city, and rayon all the work of implementing party policy, and organize fulfillment of the CPSU Central Committee's directives.

42. The fundamental duties of republic, kray, oblast, okrug, city, and rayon party organizations and their leading organs are:

a. Political and organizational work among the masses; the mobilization of Communists and all working people to implement the tasks of communist building, accelerate socioeconomic development on the basis of scientific and technical progress, increase social production efficiency and labor productivity, improve output quality, and fulfill the state plans and socialist pledges; and the ensuring of steady growth in the working people's material well-being and cultural level.

[Preceeding paragraph replaces the following paragraph from the draft:

["...a. Political and organizational work among the masses, their mobilization to carry out the tasks of communist building, the comprehensive development of industrial and agricultural production and the improvement of its efficiency, the fulfillment and overfulfillment of state plans, and the ensuring of steady growth in the working people's material well-being and cultural level;"]

b. The organization of ideological work; propaganda of Marxism-Leninism; the enhancement of working people's communist consciousness; leadership of the local press, radio, and television; and monitoring of the activity of scientific, cultural, and educational institutions;

c. Leadership of soviets of people's deputies, trade unions, the Komsomol, cooperatives, and other public organizations through the Communists working in them; increasingly broad involvement of working people in the work of these organizations; and development of the spontaneous activity and activeness of the masses as a necessary condition for the further deepening of socialist democracy;

d. Strict observance of Leninist principles and methods of leadership; the establishment of a Leninist style in party work and in all spheres of state and economic management; the ensuring of the unity of ideological, organizational, and economic activity; and the strengthening of socialist legality, state and labor [Draft had: "...the strengthening of state and labor"] discipline, order, and organization in all sectors;

e. The implementation of cadre policy and the education of cadres in the spirit of communist ideological commitment, moral purity, and high responsibility to the party and the people for the tasks entrusted to them;

f. Organization of various institutions and enterprises of the party in the republic, kray, oblast, okrug, city, and rayon, and leadership of their activity; allocation of party funds within their organization; systematic reports to the higher party organ and accountability to it for their work.

The Leading Organs of the Republic, Kray, and Oblast Party Organizations

43. The highest organ of the republic, kray, and oblast party organization is the union republic Communist Party congress and the kray and oblast party conference, and, in the period between them, the union republic Communist Party Central Committee, kraykom, and obkom.

44. The regular congress of the union republic Communist Party is convened by the Communist Party Central Committee at least once every 5 years. The regular kray and oblast conference is convened by the kraykom and obkom once every 2-3 years. Out-of-turn (extraordinary) congresses and conferences are convened by decision of the union republic Communist Party Central Committee, kraykom, or obkom, or on the demand of one-third of the total number of members of the organizations belonging to the republic, kray, or oblast party organization.

The norms for representation at the union republic Communist Party congress and kray and oblast conference are established by the relevant party committee.

The union republic Communist Party congress and kray and oblast conference hear reports from the union republic Communist Party Central Committee, kraykom, obkom, and the Auditing Commission; discuss at their discretion other questions of party, economic, and cultural building; and elect the union republic Communist Party Central Committee, kraykom, obkom, and the Auditing Commission, and delegates to the CPSU congress.

[The preceeding four paragraphs read as follows in the draft:

["...43. The highest organ of the oblast, kray, and republic party organization is the oblast and kray party conference and the union republic Communist Party congress, and, in the period between them, the obkom, kraykom, and union republic Communist Party Central Committee.

["44. The regular oblast and kray conference is convened by the obkom and kraykom once every 2-3 years. In the period between union republic Communist Party congresses, in order to discuss the most important questions of party organizations' activity, Communist Party central committees may, where necessary, convene republican party conferences. The procedure for holding republican party conferences is determined by the union republic Communist Party Central Committees.

45. The union republic Communist Party central committees, kraykoms, and obkoms elect a bureau, including committee secretaries. The secretaries must have had at least 5 years of party service. At the committee plenums chiefs of committee sections, party control commission chairmen, and editors of party papers and journals are confirmed.

Secretariats are established to handle current questions and verify execution in union republic Communist Party central committees and party kraykoms and obkoms.

46. The plenum of a union republic Communist Party Central Committee, kraykom, and obkom must be convened not less than once every 4 months.

[The preceeding five paragraphs replace the following five paragraphs from the draft:

["The party organizations of autonomous republics and of autonomous and other oblasts included in krays and union republics work under the leadership of kraykoms and the union republic Communist Party Central Committees."]

Leading Organs of Okrug, City, and Rayon (Rural and City) Party Organizations

48. The highest organ of the okrug, city, and rayon party organization is the okrug, city, and rayon party conference or general meeting of Communists convened by the okruzhkom, gorkom, or raykom once every 2-3 years, and the out-of-turn session convened by decision of the committee or by the demand of one-third of the total number of party members belonging to the corresponding party organization.

The okrug, city, and rayon conference (meeting) hears reports of the committee and the auditing commission; at its discretion examines other questions regarding party, economic, and cultural building; and elects the okruzhkom, gorkom, and raykom, the Auditing Commission, and delegates to the oblast or kray conferences and to the congress of the union republic's Communist Party.

The norms for representation at okrug, city, and rayon conferences are established by the party committee concerned.

49. The okruzhkom, gorkom, and raykom elect a bureau, including committee secretaries, and also confirm the heads of committee sections, the party control chairman, and newspaper editors. Okruzhkom, gorkom, and raykom secretaries must have at least 5 years' party membership. Committee secretaries are confirmed by the obkom, kraykom, and union republic Communist Party Central Committee.

50. The okruzhkom, gorkom, and raykom create primary party organizations, lead their activities, systematically hear reports on the work of the party organizations, and conduct the registration of Communists.

51. Okruzhkom, gorkom, and raykom plenums are convened not less than once every 3 months.

VI. Primary Party Organizations

52. The foundation of the party is the primary organizations.

Primary party organizations are created at the working place of the party member — in plants, factories, sovkhozes and other enterprises, kolkhozes, units of the armed forces, institutions, educational institutions, and so forth — where there are at least three party members. Where necessary territorial primary party organizations may also be formed at the places of residence of Communists.

In individual cases, with the permission of the obkom, kraykom, or union republic Communist Party Central ommittee, party organizations may be created within the framework of several enterprises belonging to a production association and located, as a rule, on the territory of one rayon or several rayons in one city.

53. At enterprises, kolkhozes, and institutions with over 50 CPSU members and candidate members, party organizations may be created within the overall primary party organization at workshops, sectors, livestock units, teams, departments, and so forth with the permission of the raykom, gorkom, or okruzhkom.

In the workshop, sector, and other organizations, as well as within primary party organizations with less than 50 members and candidate members, party groups may be created within the teams and other production links.

54. The highest organ of the primary party organization is the party meeting, which is held at least once a month. In party organizations which have shop organizations, meetings, both general and shop, are held at least once every 2 months.

In large party organizations numbering more than 300 Communists general party meetings are called as necessary within periods established by the party committees or at the request of several shop party organizations.

55. To conduct current work, the primary and the shop party organization elects for a period of 2-3 years a bureau whose numerical size is established at a party meeting. Primary and shop party organizations with less than 15 party members do not elect a bureau but a party organization secretary and a deputy. Elections in these organizations are held annually. [Draft did not have preceeding sentence]

The secretaries of primary and shop party organizations must have had at least 1 year of party service.

In primary party organizations with less than 150 party members, party work, as a rule, is carried out by persons not excused from their jobs.

56. Party committees can be established at large enterprises and in establishments comprising over 300 members and candidate members of the party, and in necessary cases, considering production peculiarities and territorial dispersion, also in organizations numbering over 100 Communists — with the permission of the obkom, kraykom, or the union republic Communist Party Central Committee, with the allocation to shop party organizations of these enterprises or institutions of the rights of primary party organizations.

In the party organizations of kolkhozes, sovkhozes, and other enterprises in agriculture, party committees may be created where there are 50 Communists.

In party organizations numbering over 500 Communists, in individual cases, with the permission of the obkom, kraykom, or union republic Communist Party Central Committee, party committees may be created in large shops, and the party organizations of production sectors are granted the rights of primary party organizations.

Party committees are elected for a term of 2-3 years and their size is determined by a general party meeting or conference.

Party committees, party bureaus, and secretaries of primary and shop party organizations systematically inform Communists about their work at party meetings.

57. Party committees of primary organizations numbering more than 1,000 Communists, with the permission of union republic Communist Party central committees, may be granted the rights of a party raykom on questions concerning admission to the CPSU, the registration of party members and candidates, and the examination of Communists' personal files.

Within these organizations enlarged party committees may be elected within which a bureau is formed for the leadership of current work.

58. The primary party organization is guided in its activities by the Program and Statutes of the CPSU. It is the political nucleus of the labor collective, works directly among the working people, rallies them around the party, organizes them to fulfill the tasks of communist building, and participates actively in the implementation of the party's cadre policy.

The primary party organization:

a. Admits new members to the CPSU;

b. Educates Communists in a spirit of devotion to the cause of the party, ideological conviction, and communist morality;

c. Organizes the study by Communists of Marxist-Leninist theory in close connection with the practice of communist building and combats any manifestations of bourgeois ideology, revisionism and dogmatism, and backward views and sentiments; [Draft had: "...building, and combats any attempts at revisionist distortions of Marxism-Leninism and its dogmatic interpretation and any manifestations of bourgeois ideology and backward views and sentiments;"]

[Preceeding paragraph replaces the following paragraph from the draft:

["...d. Shows concern for enhancing the vanguard role of the Communists in labor and in the sociopolitical and economic life of the enterprise, kolkhoz, institution, educational establishment, and so forth;"]

e. Organizes working people to resolve the tasks of economic and social development; heads socialist competition to fulfill state plans and pledges, to promote [Draft had: "...state plans and working people's pledges, to promote"] the intensification of production, to improve labor productivity and output quality, and to widely introduce into production the achievements of science and technology and leading experience; mobilizes the working people to find internal reserves; seeks the rational, economical utilization of material, labor, and financial resources; and displays concern for the preservation and augmentation of public wealth and the improvement of people's working and living conditions;

f. Carries out mass agitation and propaganda work, educates the working people in the spirit of devotion to the ideas of communism, Soviet patriotism, and the friendship of peoples, helps them to develop a high political culture, and enhances their social activeness and responsibility;

g. Promotes the development in Communists and all working people of habits of participation in socialist self-management, ensures an increase in the labor collective's role in the management of the enterprise or institution, and directs the work of trade union, Komsomol, and other public organizations;

[Preceeding two paragraphs replace the following paragraph, which is labeled "f," from the draft:

["...f. Carries out mass agitation and propaganda work, educates the working people in the spirit of devotion to the ideas of communism and the friendship of peoples, helps them to develop a high political culture, ensures the enhancement of the labor collective's role in the management of the enterprise or institution in accordance with the law, and promotes the development of the activeness of trade union, Komsomol, and other public organizations;"]

h. [Paragraph is labeled "g" in draft] On the basis of the wide development of criticism and self-criticism, wages a struggle against manifestations of bureaucratism, parochialism, and departmentalism and breaches of state, labor and production discipline, roots out attempts to cheat the state, takes measures against slackness, mismanagement, and waste, and seeks to establish a sober way of life.

["h. Assists the okruzhkom, gorkom, or raykom in all its activity, and accounts to it for its work."]

59. Primary party organizations of enterprises in industry, transport, communications, construction, material and technical supply, trade, public catering, and municipal and consumer services, kolkhozes, sovkhozes, and other agricultural enterprises, planning organizations, design bureaus, scientific research institutes, educational establishments, and cultural enlightenment and medical institutions have the right to monitor the activity of the administration.

Party organizations of ministries, state committees, and other central and local soviet and economic institutions and departments exercise monitoring of the work of the apparatus in fulfilling party and government directives and observing Soviet laws. They must actively influence the improvement of the work of the apparatus and the selection, placement, and education of its employees; enhance their responsibility for their assigned tasks, for the development of the sector, and for services to the population; take measures to strengthen state discipline; wage a decisive [Draft had: "...of the apparatus, educate employees in a spirit of high responsibility for their assigned tasks, take measures to strengthen state discipline and improve services to the population, wage a decisive"] struggle against bureaucratism and red tape; and promptly inform the appropriate party organs of any shortcomings in the work of the institution or individual workers, regardless of their positions.

Note. In primary party organizations commissions may be formed to exercise the right of monitoring the administration's activity and the work of the apparatus in particular areas of production activity.

VII. The Party and State and Public Organizations

60. The CPSU, acting within the framework of the USSR Constitution, exercises political leadership of state and public organizations and directs and coordinates their activity.

Party organizations and the Communists working in state and public organizations strive to ensure that these organizations fully exercise their constitutional powers and statutory rights and duties and widely involve working people in management and in the resolution of political, economic, and social questions.

Party organizations do not supplant soviet, trade union, cooperative, and other public organizations and do not tolerate confusion of the functions of party and other organs.

[Preceeding three paragraphs replace the following paragraph from the draft:

["...60. The CPSU exercises leadership of state and public organizations through the Communists working in them. The party strives to ensure that state and public organizations fully exercise their constitutional powers and statutory rights and duties and promotes the wide involvement of working people in their work. Party organizations operate within the framework of the USSR Constitution; they do not supplant soviet, trade union, cooperative, and other public organizations and do not tolerate confusion of the functions of party and other organs or unnecessary parallelism in work."]

61. At congresses, conferences, and meetings convened by state and public organizations and also in the elected organs of these organizations where there are at least three party members, party groups will be organized. The task of these groups is to pursue the party's policy in the relevant nonparty organizations, to strengthen Communists' influence on the state of affairs in these organizations, to develop democratic norms in [Draft had: "...groups is to comprehensively strengthen the influence of the party and to pursue its policy in the relevant nonparty organizations, to develop Communists' activeness and increase their responsibility for the state of affairs in these organizations, to strictly observe democratic norms in"] their activity, to strengthen party and state discipline, to struggle against bureaucratism, and to verify the execution of party and soviet directives.

62. The work of party groups in nonparty organizations is led by the corresponding party organs: the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, the union republic Communist Party Central Committee, the party kraykom, obkom, okruzhkom, gorkom, and raykom.

VIII. The Party and the Komsomol

63. The All-Union Lenin Komsomol is an independently functioning sociopolitical youth organization which is an active assistant and reserve of the party. The Komsomol helps the party to educate young people in the spirit of communism, to involve them in the practical building of a new society and the management of state and public affairs, and to mold a generation of comprehensively developed people ready for labor and the defense of the Soviet motherland. [Draft omitted "ready for labor and the defense of the Soviet motherland."]

64. Komsomol organizations are called upon to be active promoters of the party's goals in all spheres of production and public life. They have the right [Draft had: "...Komsomol organizations have the right"] of broad initiative in the discussion and submission to the appropriate party organizations of questions regarding the work of enterprises, kolkhozes, institutions, and educational establishments and participate directly [Draft had: "...of enterprises, kolkhozes, and institutions and participate directly"] in their resolution, especially where they concern the labor, life, training, and education of young people. [Draft here added the sentence: "...Komsomol organizations are called upon to be active promoters of the party's goals in all spheres of production and public life."]

65. The All-Union Komsomol works under the leadership of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. The work of the local organizations of the All-Union Lenin Komsomol is directed and controlled by the respective republic, kray, oblast, okrug, city, and rayon party organizations.

Local party organs and primary party organizations rely on the Komsomol organizations in work for the communist education of young people and for their mobilization to resolve specific tasks of production and social life, support their useful [Draft had: "...of young people, support their useful"] initiatives, and give all-round assistance in their activity.

66. Members of the All-Union Komsomol who are admitted to the CPSU leave the Komsomol the moment they join the party unless they are members of elected Komsomol organs and are in Komsomol work.

IX. Party Organizations in the Armed Forces

67. The party organizations of the Armed Forces are guided by the Program and Statutes of the CPSU in their activities and work on the basis of the instructions confirmed by the Central Committee. They ensure the implementation of party policy in the armed forces, rally their personnel around the Communist Party, educate servicemen in the spirit of the ideas of Marxism-Leninism and selfless devotion to the socialist motherland, actively assist in consolidating the unity of the army and the people, take care to increase the combat readiness of troops and strengthen military discipline, and mobilize personnel to fulfill tasks of combat and political training, to master new technology and weapons, and to irreproachably fulfill their military duties, orders, and instructions of the command.

68. The leadership of party work in the Armed Forces is carried out by the CPSU Central Committee via political organs. The Soviet Army and Navy Main Political Directorate has the rights of a section of the CPSU Central Committee.

[Preceeding paragraph read as follows in draft:

The chiefs of the political directorates of districts and fleets and the chiefs of the political sections of armies, flotillas, and formations must have had 5 years' party membership.

PRAVDA Editorial Views CPSU Congress Results

[Editorial: "At a Sharp Turning Point"]

[Text] The latest, 27th, CPSU congress, was held 25 February through 6 March 1986. The congress was held at a sharp turning point in the life of the country and the modern world as a whole. The congress was a historic event of world importance.

The congress showed that the CPSU is consistently continuing the cause of Great October, confidently proceeding along Lenin's course, and worthily fulfilling its role as political leader of the working class and entire Soviet people.

The congress has shown that the party can derive lessons to the maximum degree from the past, consider the times we are living in in a broad, Leninist manner, and elaborate a realistic, comprehensively considered program of actions.

The acceleration of the country's socioeconomic development is the party's strategic course approved by the congress.

The congress has shown that the human factor is decisive in fulfilling this program and in the success of the business of acceleration and it can only be activated through a well-considered economic strategy, strong social policy, and purposeful ideological educational work in inextricable unity.

The congress has shown that the CPSU is a party of social progress and peace, that there is no higher goal for it than the conservation of peace on earth and the prevention of a thermonuclear catastrophe.

The congress passed in an atmosphere of party principledness and unity, exactingness and Bolshevik truth, the open relevation of shortcomings and omissions and an in-depth analysis of the internal and external conditions of our society's development.

All this has been firmly cemented in the CPSU Central Committee Political Report to the 27th party congress delivered by M.S. Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee. The report incorporates the party's theoretical wisdom and its political realism and forward-looking approach expressed in the new edition of the CPSU Program; the unswerving firmness, precision, and flexibility of its organizational forms embodied in the statute; and the explicit practical orientation, specificity, and certainty of time and space [opredelennost vo vremeni i prostranstve]of the Basic Guidelines for the USSR's Economic and Social Development for 1986-1990 and the Period Through the Year 2000.

The CPSU Central Committee Political Report draws an impressive, wide-scale picture of the world today and its main trends and contradictions. It gives a comprehensive analysis of the state of Soviet society and its successes and difficulties and clerly delineates the main directions of the party's economic and social policy and the further demoncraticization of our society. It sets basic goals and defines avenues for its foreign policy strategy. It sums up the results of the discussion of the new edition of the program and the changes to the party Ssatute. It expresses confidence in the success of the great cause of socialism and communism and faith in the bright future of mankind.

Thanks to the tremendous efforts of the people, in the 25 years since the adoption of the third CPSU Program the Soviet Union has achieved impressive successes, the Political Report says. The national income has nearly quadrupled, industrial output has increased fivefold, and agricultural output has increased 70 percent. The population's real per capita incomes have increased 160 percent and public apartments have been constructed. The transition to universal secondary education has been effected. The number of VUZ graduates has quadrupled. The successes of science, medicine, and culture are universally recognized.

While assessing what has been achieved at its worth, M.S. Gorbachev noted, the CPSU leadership considers it its duty to speak honestly and frankly to the party and people of our ommissions in political and practical activity, of the unfavorable trends in the economy and the sociospiritual sphere, and of the reasons for these phenomena. Above all of the reasons of a subjective nature, when problems in the country's development has gwown more rapidly than they have been resolved. Inertia and the rigidity of forms and methods of management, the reduction of dynamism in work, and the buildup of bureaucratism — all this has caused considerable harm to the matter. Phenomena of stagnation have begun to appear in the life of society.

The party has been faced with a task of great historical importance: elaborating a fundamentally new strategic course. This course is toward the acceleration of the country's socioeconomic development and was adopted at the CPSU Central Committee April (1985) Plenum. It has met with the broad support of the party and entire people. The concept of acceleration is the leitmotif of the CPSU Central Committee Political Report and the other documents and materials of the congress and its delegates' speeches.

Acceleration, the report notes, is "above all the increase of economic growth rates. But not just that. Its thrust lies in the new quality of growth: the all-around intensification of production on the basis of scientific-technical progress, the structural reshaping of the economy, and effective forms of management and the organization and encouragement of labor." The course toward acceleration provides for the pursuit of an active social policy, the consistent assertion of the principle of socialist justice, the improvement of social relations, the renewal of the forms and methods of work of the political and ideological institutions, the intensification of socialist democracy, and the resolute overcoming of inertia, stagnation, and conservatism — of everything which is holding back social progress.

The main thing which should ensure the success of the business of acceleration is the masses' lively creativity and the maximum utilization of the socialist system's tremendous potential and advantages.

The acceleration of the country's socioeconomic development is the key to the solution of all our problems — both immediate and long-term, economic and social, domestic and foreign. The successful implementation of this course will make it possible to scale the main heights of economic and social development defined by the new draft of the CPSU Program and the Basic Guidelines.

And these heights are imposing and impressive. By the end of the century the national income will almost double, while production potential will double and will be qualitatively transformed, labor productivity will increase 130-150 percent, and national income's energy-intensiveness will drop 40 percent and its metal-intensiveness will be almost halved. This will mean a sharp turn toward the intensification of production and the improvement of quality and effectiveness.

The main means of production intensification is scientific-technical progress, the fundamental transformation of society's production forces. Here it is a case of the in-depth modernization of the national economy on the basis of the latest achievements of science and technology and of breakthroughs on their vanguard salients and the restructuring of the economic mechanism and system of management.

To this end it is planned to alter the structural and investment policy, that is, to move the focus of attention from quantitative indicators toward quality and efficiency, from intermediate results to end results, from the expansion of fixed capital to their renewal, from the buildup of fuel and raw material resources to the improvement of their use and the accelerated development of science-intensive sectors and the production and social infrastructure. Suffice it to say that in the 12th 5-Year Plan it is planned to channel over R200 billion — more than in the preceding 10 years — into the modernization and retooling of production.

A CPSU Central Committee and USSR Council of Ministers resolution has been adopted on the further development of machine building, which is essentially a program for its modernization. The idea of the fundamental reconstruction of the fuel and energy complex pervades the Energy Program.

Much has to be done in metallurgy and the chemical industry, the computerization [elektronizatsiya] and comprehensive mechanization of production, and in transport and communications. The light and other sectors of industry operating directly to satisfy the population's requirements will receive priority development.

Technical modernization is impossible to implement without a fundamental improvement in capital construction, which will require raising the entire construction complex to a new industrial and organizational level and virtually halving the investment cycle from planning capacities to their full assimilation.

The need for reconstruction sets new tasks for science. It is necessary to implement more vigorously science's shift toward the needs of the national economy. No less important is production's shift toward science and its maximum receptiveness to the achievements of science and technology.

The solution of the food problem is a paramount task. There is headway here, but the overcoming of agriculture's lag is being implemented only slowly. A resolute breakthrough is needed in order to markedly improve the population's food supplies as early as the 12th 5-Year Plan. We can and must do this. To this end it is essential to create conditions for the guaranteed production of output. It is primarily a case of increasing soil fertility and making wide use of intensive technologies. The most immediate source for supplementing the food fund is the reduction of losses of field and stockraising unit output during harvesting, transportation, storage, and processing.

Fundamental importance attaches to the creation of unified organs of management of the agro-industrial complex. The task now is to reinforce this organizational structure with an effective economic mechanism. It is important to open up scope for economic methods of management and to considerably expand the autonomy of the kolkhozes and sovkhozes and their interest in and responsibility for the end results.

The material and technical base of the agro-industrial complex will continue to develop consistently. But man has been and remains the main motive force in progress and is its soul. Constant concern for rural workers' working and daily living conditions is the firmest guarantee of successes.

To resolve the new tasks in the economy successfully, it is essential to restructure the economic mechanism and to create an integral, effective, flexible system of management that will make it possible to realize socialism's potential more fully.

Economic management, the CPSU Central Committee Political Report to the congress says, is in need of constant improvement. But the situation now is such that we cannot limit ourselves to partial improvements — what is needed is radical reform. Its point is to really subordinate our entire production to public needs and the satisfaction of people's requirements, to direct management toward the improvement of efficiency and quality, the acceleration of scientific-technical progress, and the development of workers' interest in the results of their labor and of their initiative and socialist resourcefulness in every link of the national economy, above all in the labor collectives.

Socioeconomic acceleration and the actual consolidation of socialism should be the supreme criterion of the improvement of management and of the entire system of socialist production relations.

The implementation of the strategy of in-depth transformations elaborated by the party will require considerable time. It is necessary to achieve an increase in growth rates right now, however. Hence the need for the maximum mobilization of all our reserves — organizational-economic and sociopsychological factors, the better utilization of the existing production potential, the enhanced effectiveness of labor incentives, the consolidation of organization and discipline, and the overcoming of thriftlessness. It is essential to strengthen the discipline of deliveries under production sharing agreements, to overcome the lack of rhythm in production, to improve the use of manpower resources, to economize everywhere and in everything, and not to overlook thriftlessness and extravagance.

Of particularly great importance is the fundamental improvement of the quality of output. For this it is necessary to make use of the full force of material and administrative influence and of our laws. The task of improving quality should become the concern of every Communist and every Soviet person.

Another of our more important reserves is the widespread dissemination of leading experience and socialist competition, which should be directed toward the improvement of the quality of work, economy and thrift, and the scaling of the projected heights in every collective and at every work place.

The congress' attention was focused on questions of social policy and concern for man and the improvement of the people's welfare.

In the forthcoming 15 years it is planned to double the volume of resources channeled into improving living conditions. The population's real per capita incomes are to be increased 60-80 percent. In the 12th 5-Year Plan the increase in incomes will encompass millions of people. Housing and sociocultural construction is being expanded. The improvement of people's lives must be inextricably linked with the growth of their labor and social output.

It is essential to step up control over the degree of labor and consumption, to establish wages' stricter dependence on labor productivity and quality, to resolutely eradicate levelling down, to prevent payments of unearned money and undeserved bonuses, to wage an uncompromising struggle against unearned incomes, and to persistently assert social justice.

The essence of social justice is expressed in the basic principle of socialism: "from each according to his abilities, to each according to his labor."

The party intends to pursue a line toward the further growth and more effective utilization of public funds. In the 12th 5-Year Plan their volume will increase 20-23 percent.

Central and local party, state, and economic organs must radically alter their attitude toward questions of saturating the market with high-quality goods and services and must ensure the fulfillment of the comprehensive program for the development of the production of consumer goods and the services sphere.

The dimensions of housing construction and the modernization of schools will be built up, cooperative and individual construction and the erection of youth complexes will be encouraged, and the allocation of housing will be improved.

Labor and its content will undergo profound changes. Labor productivity will be increased and the proportion of manual and unskilled labor will be sharply reduced in the production sphere.

The party sets the task of creating a unified system of uninterrupted education. To this end it is necessary to implement consistently the reform of the general educational and vocational school, to fundamentally improve the training of young people for independent life and work, to restructure higher and secondary specialized education, to ameliorate the training and use of specialists, and to improve the system for improving the qualifications of workers and specialists and retraining them.

Radical measures are needed that are aimed at improving health care, developing mass physical culture and sport and tourism, and ensuring fully employed leisure for people, particularly young people. Exceptinally great importance is given to work to assert a healthy way of life and to overcome drunkenness and alcoholism.

Under present conditions the task of nature conservation and the rational use of nature's resources is acute. Socialism, with its planned organization of production and humanitarian world outlook, can and must resolve this problem.

The cornerstone of the CPSU's policy is the ensuring of the leading role of the working class and the consolidation of the alliance of the working class, kolkhoz peasantry, and working intelligentsia.

The party will continue tirelessly to strengthen the fraternal friendship of our country's peoples, to educate working people in a spirit of Soviet patriotism and internationalism, and to wage a principled struggle against any manifestations of nationalism, chauvinism, and localistic tendencies.

The consolidation of the family, the enhancement of parents' responsibility for their children's upbringing, and the improvement of women's working and daily living conditions are within the party's field of vision.

The social policy formulated by the party, the Political Report notes, is multifaceted and perfectly feasible. If we are able to secure a resolute turn toward the social sphere, many of today's and tomorrow's problems will be resolved much more rapidly and effectively than hitherto.

The socialist system develops successfully only when the people themselves really manage their own affairs and when millions of people take part in political life. This is working people's self-management in the Leninist sense and constitutes the essence of Soviet power. Self-management principles develop not outside but inside our statehood, penetrating increasingly deeply every pore of state and social life, enriching the content of democratic centralism, and strengthening its socialist nature.

The congress stressed the importance of ensuring that the activity of the USSR Supreme Soviet and the union and autonomous republic supreme soviets to develop legislation, monitor the work of the organs under their jurisdiction, and lead the soviets of people's deputies at all levels becomes still more businesslike and consistent and that the work of local soviets in mobilizing the masses to accelerate our society's socioeconomic development and in resolving questions of the population's everyday life and of the satisfaction of people's demands and needs is enhanced and improved still more resolutely. Manifestations of departmentalism, parochialism, irresponsibility, bureaucratism, and official indifference to people must be resolutely eradicated in the work of soviet ispolkoms and other state organs.

The role of the trade unions, the Komsomol, creative unions, voluntary societies, and women's organizations in managing state and social affairs will be further enhanced. The utilization of all forms of direct democracy, especially in labor collectives, and the improvement of the practice of nationwide discussion and voting on major questions of the country's life are a subject of the party's special attention Fundamental importance is given to expanding publicity in the activity of state and other organs and increasing the population's level of information about the decisions they adopt and progress in fulfilling those decisions.

The party attaches great importance to constantly strengthening the legal basis of state and social life, to the strictest observance of the laws, and to consolidating guarantees of Soviet people's rights and freedoms.

The responsibility of state security organs is increasing under the conditions of the buildup in imperialism's subversive aspirations against the USSR and the other socialist countries.

The improvement in every possible way of the Armed Forces' combat readiness, the education of Army and Navy servicemen and all Soviet people in a spirit of vigilance and constant readiness to defend the great gains of socialism, and the maintenance of the Armed Forces at a level precluding strategic superiority on the part of imperialist forces must remain one of the most important tasks.

The party's present course and the strategy of acceleration create exceptionally favorable potential for considerably improving the effectiveness of ideological activity, potential which is as yet being poorly utilized. The task is to bring working people's ideological and political education and its forms and methods into line with the realities of domestic and international life and to ensure its combination with organizational and economic activity.

The more active the role of Marxist-Leninist theory in interpreting living practice is, the more successfully the improvement of socialist society is implemented. Social sciences research must be focused on the fundamental tasks of accelerating our society's progress and of its attainment of a new qualitative state.

The education of working people in the spirit of communist ideological commitment and devotion to the Soviet motherland, proletarian, socialist internationalism, a conscientious attitude toward labor and public property, and intolerance of everything that is alien to socialism, to our culture, and to our collectivist morality constitutes the main points in ideological work. The ideological commitment of the builders of communism is inseparable from honesty, conscientiousness, and decency.

The role of the mass news and propaganda media in implementing the party's economic strategy and social policy and in molding public consciousness is increasing.

Party organizations' activity in the sphere of cultural building must be aimed at resolving the tasks of increasingly fully satisfying people's spiritual demands and interests and at ensuring the conditions for the realization of their capabilities and for the meaningful utilization of free time. The role of literature and art in this is great. The party supports and will continue to support everything talented and imbued with the spirit of party-mindedness and popular spirit in this sphere.

The participation of all leading cadres, a comprehensive approach, and the unity of education at production, in studies, and at people's place of residence are the demands made on the organization of ideological work.

The main thing in education is the maximum specificity and individual work with the living person, whether he is a selfless working person or the bearer of an antisocialist morality.

The new, large-scale and complex tasks being resolved by our society make high demands on the party's entire political, ideological, and organizational activity. The fundamental restructuring of party work, the establishment in every party organization of an atmosphere of creativity, principled exactingness, and self-criticism, and the quest for effective new solutions of socioeconomic, scientific and technical, and ideological education problems are a matter of paramount importance. To call things by their proper names, to judge everything frankly, to provide objective information to higher party organs and the masses, and to display great exactingness and honesty always and in everything — all this must be the immutable rule in party work. It is necessary to develop criticism and self-criticism in every possible way, to step up the struggle against ostentation, and to correct those workers who pay lip service to restructuring but think and act according to obsolete schemes and are oversensitive to criticism. Any attempts to suppress healthy criticism and persecute people over it must be resolutely ended.

The main thing is to establish everywhere a businesslike and militant style of work and flexible, efficient methods and means of work.

Cadres are the party's invaluable asset. It is necessary to continue to pursue consistently and persistently a cadre policy that accords with present demands and party tasks. The decisive criteria in promoting and transferring cadres must be ideological and moral qualities, their real deeds, and their ability to vigorously implement the party's political line.

The face of our 20th century is determined by the liberation revolutions initiated by Great October. The progress of contemporary society is rightly linked with socialism. "World socialism," the congress resolution on the CPSU Central Committee Political Report notes, "is a powerful international formation. It is based on a highly developed economy, a modern scientific base, and reliable military-political potential. Socialism constantly demonstrates the possibility of solving social problems on a fundamentally different — collectivist — basis and has led the countries traveling this path to greater heights of development." Socialism creates an increasingly firm barrier to the ideology and policy of war and militarism, reaction and violence, and all forms of misanthropy and actively promotes mankind's social progress.

The Political Report gives a profound and comprehensive characterization of modern capitalism, which under the influence and against the background of the scientific and technical revolution sharpens the conflict between the colossally increased productive forces and the private ownership nature of social relations. A further deepening of the general crisis of capitalism is taking place.

Under contemporary conditions imperialism represents a growing threat to the very existence of mankind. Its most monstrous result is militarism, which seeks to subject to its influence and interests the entire political machine of bourgeois society and to control its spiritual life and culture. It is precisely imperialism that is responsible for the wars and conflicts of our age, for unleashing and constantly spurring on the arms race, and for opening up new directions in it. Imperialism was the first to use nuclear weapons. It is now preparing to take a new and possibly irrevocable step — transferring the arms race to space. Imperialism is pushing mankind toward the abyss of thermonuclear catastrophe, which threatens to destroy all intelligent life on earth.

The problem of war and peace is the most acute problem now facing mankind. Never before has such a terrible danger hung over it. But never before have there been such real opportunities to preserve and consolidate peace. The potential of the forces of peace is growing. The vigorous, consistently peace-loving policy of the socialist states and their strengthening economic and defense might are guarding peace. The overwhelming majority of Asian, African, and Latin American states are in favor of peace. The antiwar movements of the broadest people's masses on all continents are in favor of peace. And no matter how great the threat of war, the CPSU proceeds from the premise that world war is not fatally inevitable. It is possible to prevent war and to save mankind from disaster. This is the historic vocation of socialism and all progressive, peace-loving forces on our planet.

The main aim of the party's foreign policy strategy is to provide the Soviet people with the opportunity to work under conditions of lasting peace and freedom. Therefore the struggle against the nuclear danger and the arms race and for the preservation and strengthening of world peace remains the main direction of the party's activity in the international arena for the future.

The central direction in the USSR's foreign policy in the coming years must be the struggle to implement the program for the elimination of weapons of mass destruction and the prevention of another world war put forward in the 15 January 1986 statement by the general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee.

Under the conditions of the nuclear threat, objective conditions have emerged in which the struggle between capitalism and socialism can proceed only and exclusively in forms of peaceful competition and peaceful rivalry.

The course of history is increasingly urgently demanding the organization of constructive, creative collaboration between states and peoples on a planet-wide scale. The real dialectic of contemporary world development lies in the combination of competition, the historical struggle between the two systems, and the growing trend toward objective interdependence and collaboration among the world community. A contradictory but interconnected, and in many respects integral, world emerges via the struggle of opposites. The congress noted the special importance of the principled "basic principles for the creation of an all-embracing system of international security" put forward in the Central Committee Political Report.

The CPSU's foreign policy course that takes into account the dynamism of the economic and political development of the world socialist system, with which the face of peace and of social progress is today more closely linked than ever. It is a course of honest, open relations with all communist parties and all states in the world socialist system and of a comradely exchange of opinions between them.

It is a course of socialist economic integration among the socialist community countries, of further developing the political cooperation among them, whose heart has been and remains the collaboration among the ruling communist parties, and improving and renewing its methods and forms, of mutual enrichment with thoughts, ideas, and experience of socialist building, and of seeking mutually acceptable solutions of the most complex problems.

It is a course of the unity of the international communist movement, which has nothing in common with uniformity and hierarchy, with interference by some parties in the affairs of others, or with a desire on the part of any party for a monopoly on the truth. It is a course of strengthening the solidarity and cooperation among communist and workers parties in the struggle for the common goals of peace and socialism.

It is a course of solidarity with the forces of social and national liberation, of close collaboration with the socialist-oriented countries, with revolutionary democratic parties, and with the Nonaligned Movement, and of developing contacts and cooperation with social democracy.

It is a course of expanding relations with everyone who opposes war and advocates international security and of closer cooperation for the sake of achieving success in the battle against nuclear war, success that will be a historic victory for all mankind and for each person on our planet.

In the resolution on the Political Report the 27th CPSU Congress resolved:

— to approve the CPSU Central Committee's political course and practical activity;

— to approve the propositions, conclusions, and tasks set out in the Central Committee Political Report to the congress and for all party organizations to be guided by them in their work.

The congress unanimously approved the new edition of the CPSU Program and the CPSU Statutes with proposed changes and adopted appropriate resolutions.

Resolutions approving the CPSU Central Auditing Commission report and the new statute relating to that commission were also unanimously approved.

N.I. Ryzhkov, chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers, delivered a report "On the Basic Guidelines for the Economic and Social Development of the USSR in 1986-1990 and for the Period Through the Year 2000." The congress unanimously approved the Basic Guidelines and adopted an appropriate resolution.

The congress elected the party's central organs. A CPSU Central Committee plenum was held 6 March. M.S. Gorbachev was unanimously elected Central Committee general secretary.

The 27th CPSU Congress is a historic milestone in the life of the party and the people. The general line that was adopted and approved of accelerating the country's socioeconomic development and consolidating peace on earth is the main political result of the congress. The attention of the whole party, Soviet people, and the world public has been focused on the course and results of its work. Its decisions determine both the nature and pace of our advance for years and decades to come.

The Soviet people are greeting the congress decisions as their own decisions, are approving them, and are expressing love of and trust in the party and the readiness to work persistently, creatively, and enterprisingly for the glory of the motherland. The congress gave a powerful stimulus to scoring new successes in creative work and in achieving a new qualitative state of our society. The congress, M.S. Gorbachev said in his closing speech, "set a high moral and spiritual tone for the party's activity and the life of the whole country."

The paramount task is to convey the essence and the spirit of the congress decisions to every party organization, every Communist, and every Soviet person and to efficiently organize their unconditional fulfillment. A decisive role in this belongs to party organizations, which are called upon to head the masses in their struggle and labor at the sharp breakthrough in our country's history. It is the paramount task of the mass news and propaganda media — the press, radio, and television — to help the party propagandize, explain, and organize the fulfillment of the congress decisions.

Our plans are difficult and imposing. But they can and must be fulfilled. The guarantee of that is our wonderful, industrious people. The guarantee of that is the party, the party of Bolsheviks and Communists that has traveled an incomparable path of struggle and creation. The guarantee of that is the tremendous potential of socialism, the living creativity of the masses, and the support for the party's ideas and deeds from the working class, the peasantry, the people's intelligentsia, and the whole Soviet people. The party and the people will accomplish everything and will successfully implement the cause of communist creation.

Shishlin Comments on Significance of Congress

[Nikolay Shishlin commentary]

[Text] As you know, 1986 has been designated by the UN as the Year of Peace. And I think that on this day in March, immediately after the completion of the 27th CPSU Congress, we are already entitled to say that our country has made a very substantial contribution to making 1986 indeed a year for strengthening peace and radically improving the world political climate.

The work of the 27th CPSU Congress has shown that Soviet communists are building no illusions as to the nature of the time we are living through. No, this is a very difficult time in human history, a difficult point in the development of international events. And Soviet Communists are mapping out an absolutely balanced, realistic, honest, and open course in international affairs. The reference points by which the Communist Party of the Soviet Union is guided in the international sphere remain unchanged: our aims are to strengthen peace, develop peaceful cooperation and firmly establish the norms of peaceful coexistence in our relations with states having different social systems. But the 27th congress has introduced much that is new in ways of achieving these objectives.

The ideas set forth in the Central Committee Political Report and in the course of discussion at the congress indicate that the scope for strengthening peace is expanding. Above all, I think what makes Soviet foreign policy initiatives so promising is the fact that these initiatives have incorporated all that was sound and sensible in the broad international discussions that have taken place, say, over the past year. Furthermore, the Soviet initiatives are forward looking in that they are in tune with the aspirations, interests and demands of international development.

The next thing I would like to draw attention to is that all channels of communication are open. All the possibilities for a fruitful political dialogue, even with such very difficult partners as the United States, are open. And obviously one cannot fail to mention that the reaction to the congress — not a simple reaction, of course, but on the whole deeply positive — on the part of the international public is not only a spiritual factor, but also a solidly political one.

["27th CPSU Congress Resolution on the Basic Guidelines for the Economic and Social Development of the USSR for 1986-1990 and the Period Through the Year 2000" — PRAVDA headline]

[Text] Having heard and discussed the report by Comrade N.I. Ryzhkov, chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers, on the Basic Guidelines for the Economic and Social Development of the USSR for 1986-1990 and the Period Through the Year 2000, the 27th CPSU Congress notes that the draft Basic Guidelines accord with the provisions of the new edition of the CPSU Program, the party's general course of accelerating the country's socioeconomic development, and the tasks of intensifying the national economy on the basis of technical progress, ensuring the steady improvement of the people's well-being, and maintaining the country's defense capability at the requisite level.

The 27th CPSU Congress decrees that:

1. The Basic Guidelines for the Economic and Social Development of the USSR for 1986-1990 and the Period Through the Year 2000 be ratified.

2. That the USSR Council of Ministers elaborate in accordance with the Bsasic Guidelines a draft State Plan for the Economic and Social Development of the USSR in 1986-1990 with targets specified for the years of the 5-year plan, for USSR ministries and departments, for union republics, and for the most important economic regions, and submit it for examination by the USSR Supreme Soviet in May 1986.

The 5-year plan should envisage the implementation of targets and measures laid down by the Basic Guidelines for increasing the rate and improving the effectiveness of economic development and for achieving further improvements in the Soviet people's living standard. During the elaboration of the 5-year plan, it is necessary to examine proposals submitted at the 27th CPSU Congress and during the report and election campaign in the party and the nationwide discussion of the draft new edition of the CPSU Program and draft Basic Guidelines.

3. The 27th CPSU Congress regards the high-quality elaboration and organization of the efficient fulfillment of the new 5-year plan as a very important economic and political task for all party, soviet, trade union, Komsomol, and economic organizations.

In the 12th 5-Year Plan it is necessary to ensure a fundamental breakthrough in work, to mobilize our resources and potential more fully, and to bring into play all reserves for the unconditional fulfillment of the projected plans. The rate of progress in all spheres of socioeconomic development is to be increased by providing scope for the masses' creative initiative and by strengthening discipline and order.

The congress expresses firm confidence that under the Communist Party's leadership the Soviet people will achieve new successes in communist building and in strengthening our socialist motherland's might.

Fedorchuk Assigned to Soviet Army Inspectorate

AU091457 Paris AFP in English 1016 GMT 9 Mar 86

[By Pierre Bocev]

[Text] Moscow, March 9 (AFP) — General Vitaliy Fedorchuk, who was abruptly moved from his position as interior minister on January 25, has been assigned to the Inspectorate of the Soviet Army, it was reliably learned here Sunday. The inspector position, which lacks prestige and is tantamount to semi-retirement, is consistent with previous speculation that Gen. Fedorchuk has been disgraced. Exactly why he may have been disgraced has not been made clear, although Mr. Fedorchuk is thought to have had ties with the late President Leonid Bezhnev, who has fallen from favour under the new regime of Mikhail Gorbachav. The theory of his disgrace gained ground last week when he failed to be elected to the Central Committee at the close of the 27th Communist Party Congress.

Gen. Fedorchuk's predecessor, Nikolay Shchelokov, publicly disgraced and sacked in 1982, was also made army inspector before he committed suicide to avoid prosecution for charges that were reportedly related to corruption.

The announcement of Gen. Fedorchuk's replacement in an official communique baffled the most seasoned Kremlin watchers, who were unable immediately to predict whether it would mean disgrace or promotion. Born in the Ukraine in 1918, he spent the war in counter-espionage, then worked after the war in occupied Austria. He became KGB chief in the Ukraine in 1970, a post he held until becoming interior minister in 1982. The duties of an army inspector are purely honorary and do not involve any real work. The job has been used as a form of semi-retirement since Brezhnev decided that soldiers above a certain rank should "die in their boots". Vitaliy Fedorchuk has been an army general since 1982.

RSFR Justice Minister Previews Law Reforms

AU051723 Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German 5 Mar 86 p 3

[Report on "exclsusive interview" given by Aleksandr Sukharev, Association of Soviet Jurists' chairman, to VOLKSSTIMME correspondents Otto Janecek and ErichFeichtinger in Moscow — date not given]

[Text] Major changes in legislation — possibly even including the abolition of capital punihnent — were announced by Aleksandr Sukharev, RSFSR Minister of Justice and chairman of the Association of Soviet Jurists, in a VOLKSSTIMME interview. In his political report Mikhail Gorbachev had said, "Recently much has been achieved to strengthen legal order in all spheres of societal life," and "We are faced with the task of continuing to improve the quality of Soviet laws." We asked Minister Sukharev to give us some details on this.

He sees three main directions in the current development. First, legislation has to be improved and in this connection, the obligation to give an accountability report is to be increased. Second, it is necessary to combat alcoholism not only on a moral basis, but also with legal means. And third, it is intended to raise the obligation of communists, party functionaries, and "all functionaries of the hierarchy" to give an accountability report.

The new laws which are being worked out concern combating speculation and "income without work," strengthening people's control, and the obligation to give an accountability report in the entire state and economic system. It is also envisaged to introduce some sort of rotation system for cadres.

Society's Sensibility Is Increasing

But this does not mean that societal affairs have deteriorated compared with the past. On the contrary, in the long run the crime rate has been decreasing in the Soviet Union — there are, of course, some ups and downs over certain periods of time. But: "Society's sensibility is increasing. We do not want to put up with crime any longer. The press will be more and more intolerant. This is the development. I guarantee this."

Concerning the question of corruption, the justice minister said: "Let us look at how it is countered in the West. There, these affairs are unveiled before elections because the political parties fight each other. Do the people participate in this? No. People cannot check on a Flick. In our country, however, all documents are open to inspection, all accounts can be examined by the people's control. This also applies to my ministry."

We wanted to know if certain aspects of the problem are not linked with the low salaries of certain occupational groups.

The minister said: "In our country the differences in income are not as large as in the West. Bribers and bribed exist only in those sectors where nothing is done against them, where people's control does not work. Cases like those in Uzbekistan, in Rostov, in parts of Moscow are not the general picture; they are local incidents. However, I do not want to say with these arguments that certain salaries should not be raised."

Future draft bills will also be aimed at making possible some sort of small business in the sector of services, craftsmanship, and trade. (Now repair and service work is often done illicitly and the material is frequently stolen from the enterprise by the moonlighters.)

U.S. Jurists Had No Objections to the Legal System

Concerning the so-called human rights campaign which is waged against the Soviet Union by the West: "This campaign will continue, it is a part of the West's strategy."

Sukharev recalled that last year alone 1,800 U.S. jurists visited the Soviet Union. As experts they did not have any objections to the Soviet legal system.

The minister stated: "I visited the United States and there I spoke with the chief justice of the Supreme Court. He was not against our legal system. Experts do not say the things that journalists, who are paid for this, write in the papers. The whole campaign is only possible because the people in the West know too little about our life and our legal system."

"It is nonsense to say we imprison people because their opinions differ in some respects from those of the party," the minister says angrily and continues, "In each family there are people who are not content, who hold a different opinion. I am a communist, my mother is strictly religious and sometimes I even have to take her to church by car. My mother, for instance, also thinks that my brother should earn more than I. She says: You only make phone calls and he works with machine tools. There are so many different opinions; it would really be ridiculous to imprison people for that."

Party Members Before the Court

Concerning the general trend in Soviet legislation, Aleksandr Sukharev said it goes toward more lenient punishment for first offenders and toward more social integration for them; only in the case of those who fall back into crime and in the case of certain crimes will there be more severe punishment. Before the April plenary session there were cases in which party members only received a party penalty and were not handed over to the judicial authorities. This is now at an end. The minister says:
"Everybody is equal before the law, but there are also psychological aspects and I think that, in the future, judges will punish communists more severely." At present, the question of capital punishment is being discussed and the main direction points to its abolition. The minister also explained why capital punishment was introduced: Due to humanitarian considerations there is no life imprisonment in the Soviet Union. The maximum penalty consists of 10 to 15 years in prison. But after the war a special situation arose. Nobody would have accepted collaborators getting away with such low prison terms — thus the justice minister considers capital punishment as a "temporary and extraordinary measure" and as an opponent of capital punishment he will vote for its abolition.

Basic Guidelines Crucial to Economic Strategy

[Editorial: "Time of Vigorous Action"]

[Text] The 27th CPSU Congress is continuing its work. The report "On the Basic Guidelines for the Economic and Social Development of the USSR for 1986-1990 and the Period Through the Year 2000" delivered by N.I. Ryzhkov, chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers, was listened to with great attention. In the report the congress' political directives are translated into the specific language of practical actions and broad prospects for economic and cultural building are mapped out.

The party's program objectives, which are to be achieved by the end of the current century, determine the most important avenues for qualitative transformations of society's productive forces and social development. To unswervingly follow this course means to achieve, primarily, an increase in economic growth rates on a qualitatively new basis — the intensification of production, the acceleration of scientific and technical progress, the structural reordering of the economy, and the application of effective forms of management and labor oprganization and incentive.

The 12th 5-Year Plan is the first, and an extremely crucial, stage in the implementation of the party's long-term economic strategy. This is precisely the 5-year plan which is to set the national economy on a trajectory toward development, which by the end of the century will double the volumes of national income and industrial production and create an economic potential approximately equal to that accumulated in all the preceding years of Soviet power.

The party's present-day economic course has been verified taking account of the opinion of the broad masses, objective assessments of the results of the last 5-year plan, and the serious shortcomings in production organization and management revealed with party-minded principledness. The necessary conclusions for the future have been made; now the main thing is to consistently and persistently implement the party's strategic line, utilizing all the advantages and potential of the planned economy for this purpose.

The party is setting the task of raising the people's prosperity to a qualitatively new level. It is first and foremost a question of solving the social problems in the main sphere of man's life — his labor activity. The priority objective of the party's long-term social policy is to more than halve the proportion of manual labor and release over 20 million people from unskilled work. Its other important objectives are to achieve full satisfaction of the population's growing demand for high-quality goods and services, provide a separate apartment for practically every Soviet family, and radically improve the entire sphere of social services.

To scale these heights of people's prosperity within the planned deadlines will require a substantial increase in social production efficiency and an acceleration of economic development rates. And not by increasing consumption of resources. Intensification across the entire front — not of individual sectors, irrespective of their importance, but of the national economy as a whole — this is the sole and the only path of acceleration.

Every sector and republic, every ministry and enterprise must have precise production reference points and clear plans — of a kind which will provide scope for mass initiative and creativity and orient the masses toward genuinely revolutionary transformations. Today this is the most important political task of party and economic organs, all social organizations, and every labor collective. Its practical essence lies in shifting the center of attention from quantitative to qualitative indicators, from interim to end results, from the buildup to the renewal of fixed capital.

In the 12th 5-Year Plan the priority in industry is given to machine-building, which must provide the national economy with resource-saving equipment and create the conditions for a breakthrough in the vanguard areas of scientific and technical progress. The retooling and reconstruction of production will be closely combined with vitally important new construction. For the first time it is planned to obtain the entire increase in national income from labor productivity growth in all sectors of material production. Today any engineering and economic decision must be viewed from the standpoint of constantly increasing the contribution made by science and technology and making all possible savings.

The new 5-year plan must become a breakthrough period in all respects; primarily from the viewpoint of organizing the fulfillment of plans and strengthening contract discipline. The plan is a law and norm of socialist economic management. And a political assessment should be made of any attempt to deviate from this most important principle.

Centralized planned leadership of the economy is a great gain and fundamental advantage of socialism. And it is immutable. At the same time there will be a resolute broadening of the frontiers of enterprise and association independence, an increase in their responsibility for end results, and a deepening of financial autonomy. Implementing this in practice means establishing a strict dependence between what a labor collective has done and the funds which it has earned. There can be no other way: What we make is ours and that is how we will live.

It is now a matter of really achieving profound changes and making vigorous action a daily practical reality for everybody and in everything. Only through the determination, energy, and persistence of the millions can the tasks set by the party be implemented. They are in keeping with Soviet people's vital interests, their hopes for the future, and our ideals and peaceful aspirations.

Vega Spacecraft Study Halley's Comet in Detail

Vega-1 Transmits Photos

[Text] Moscow, March 7 TASS — The Soviet automatic craft Vega-1 has passed through the gas-and-dust shroud of Halley's Comet that has been attracting mankind's attention for over two millenia. More than five hundred TV pictures of this celestial visitor have been taken by Vega-1.

These days five craft, including two Soviet probes, Vega-1 and Vega-2, have been closely watching the comet. Comets remain the least studied objects of the solar system although several of them are discovered every year.

Halley's Comet has been known to people at least since the year 240 B.C. Its appearance once in 75-76 years in those remote times were received as an evil omen portending earthquakes, droughts, floods or wars.

At present Halley's Comet is being met by probing craft of which two were launched by Japan, two by the Soviet Union and one by members of the European space research organization. They will carryout different tasks, helping each other.

The pictures sent back to earth by Vega-1 and Vega-2 will enable European researchers to check the trajectory so that their craft, Giotto, could pass approximately within 300 miles of the nucleus and take thousands of pictures on the way.

The comet is also being watched from the ground, at the Zelenchuk astro-physical observatory in the North Caucasus. There, the comet was photographed in September, 1984 when its luminosity was approximately five-millions of that of the weakest stars.

Scientists speaking different languages have now gathered at the space research institute under the Academy of Sciences of the USSR, which receives incoming information from board the Vega craft. Apart from Soviet scientists the Vega project involves specialists from Austria, Bulgaria, Hungary, the GDR, Poland, the FRG, France and Czechoslovakia. Scientists from the USA are also present in the hall.

There was a telephone call at the editorial board of one of Moscow's newspapers. A female voice asked: "What has happened to the Halley's Comet? Why is it not visible?" It turned out that this woman, Zinayda Yefromva from Moscow, watched the comet in the Crimea in 1910.

Vega-2 Passes Comet

LD090949 Moscow World Service in English 0900 GMT 9 Mar 86

[Text] The second Soviet interplanetary probe Vega-2 has passed Halley's Comet. It came even closer to the nucleus of the comet than the other Soviet probe Vega-1 to the distance of some 8,000 km. It broadcast a clear picture of the head part of the comet, including the nucleus. Millions of people were able to see the images thanks to the Intervision Network. The images confirmed the information reported by the first Vega: The nucleus of the comet is solid and surrounded by a thick layer of dust.

The Institute for Space Studies has announced that on Monday, after retrieval, the first reports will be issued by scientists about the information reported by Vega today. Professor Vyacheslav Balebanov stressed that outstanding Soviet technology helped to conduct absolutely new studies. He said that now humanity would have a new idea of the comet.

International Effort

LD091210 Moscow TASS in English 1136 GMT 9 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow, March 9 TASS — The comprehensive, multipurpose programme for the study of Halley's Comet by means of the Soviet automatic stations Vega-1 and Vega-2, which was outlined by scientists and experts and the member-countries of the international "Venus-Halley's Comet" project, has been implemented in full.

At 10.20 hours Moscow time today the Vega-2 station passed the nucleus of Halley's Comet at a minimum pre-calculated distance of 8,200 kilometres. Television photography, a study of the physical and chemical characterstics of the nucleus and of the inner regions of the gas-and-dust shell of the comet was carried out. A large volume of information has been received about the dynamic properties, structure and composition of that celestial body.

The television system of the Vega-2 station carried out the first study of the comet on March 7 when they were divided by a distance of 14 million kilometres. The main session of scientific research was carried out on March 9.

Nearly 700 pictures of the comet made in various zones of the optical spectrum have been obtained by means of television equipment of the Vega-2 station. Valuable information about the physical and chemical properties of the nucleus and the processes occurring in the gas-and-dust shell around it have been sent back to earth.

The Space Research Institute of the Academy of Sciences of the USSR and other Soviet centres are processing the incoming information jointly with the organisations of Austria, Bulgaria, Hungary, the GDR, Poland, the USA, France, the FRG and Czechoslovakia, which took part in work under the international "Venus-Halley's Comet" project. The results of the trajectory measurements made during the communication sessions with the Vega-2 station are being processed and will be sent to the administration of the European Space Agency for a more accurate guidance of the Giotto spacecraft, which is to fly past the cometary nucleus on March 13.

The flight of the two Soviet Vega automatic interplanetary stations to Halley's Comet opens a new stage in the study of the laws of the formation and development of the solar system. It is for the first time after flights towards planets that spacecraft were sent to study a small celestial body. The unique data obtained by the Vega-1 and Vega-2 stations in the course of direct measurements of characteristics and composition of the properties of the cometary substance are of a worldwide scientific significance and broaden the scientific ideas about the initial stages in the formation of the planetary systems, make a tremendous contribution to the science of the universe.

The new remarkable achievement of Soviet cosmonautics is the first step on the way of implementing the history-making decisions of the 27th Congress of the CPSU on a further study and exploration of outer space with peaceful aims for the benefit of the whole mankind.

The successful implementation of the big international project for the study of Venus and Halley's Comet, in which large teams of scientists and experts of socialist and capitalist countries took part, demonstrates the real opportunities and broad vistas in the peaceful exploration of outer space through pooling the efforts of different states.

Studies Continue

[Text] Moscow, March 9 TASS — TASS correspondent Rena Kuznetsova reports from the Press Center of the Foreign Ministry of the USSR: As the clock showed 10 hours 20 minutes Moscow time, the moment when the second Soviet space probe, Vega-2, was to be making its closest approach to Halley's Comet and transmitting valuable data about that mysterious heavenly body back to earth, the excitement among the people following the experiment reached its peak.

"All's going right under the program," came on the voice of the commentator, an expert involved with the international project "Vega" (The Russian abbreviation for Venus and Halley's Comet).

The comet could now be seen clearly and distinctly, to the delight of the hundreds of specialists, scientists and engineers of the nine countries participating in the unique experiment, who had been loking forward to this moment eagerly ever since Vega-2 was blasted off from the Soviet space launch site Baykonur in December 1984.

The comet's closeups sent in by that interplanetary craft as well as the earlier pictures from its sister probe Vega-1 meant that the two completed their space treks successfully. "The pictures received today, I should say, show a greater sharpness and contrast range than the ones beamed back by Vega-1," commented Lev Mukhin of the Space Research Institute.

As more images came on view, experts explained their better quality by Vega-2 coasting along just 8,200 kilometers from the comet's nucleus, while Vega-1 had not come closer than some 9,000 kilometers. Besides, the solar wind today was weaker as it was calmer on the sun than at the time of the first probe's rendezvous with the comet.

The latter's state too was not as active as then and so the dust cloud around it was less dense. Experts explained the fact as depending on the comet's rotation around its own axis.

Asked about the makeup of the nucleus of Halley's Comet, they said it most likely consists of ice and mineral compounds. Some of the earthlings will perhaps be disappointed to learn that the heavenly stranger is just a huge dirty snowball but scientists found nothing sensational about the fact as they had expected just that.

Newsmen also asked about the role of comets in the origination of life on earth. There is, indeed, a hypothesis that it is comets that can carry living matter from one place to another across the universe. Some scientists even take the view that the radioactive isotope of aluminium, which is contained in some comets, can heat them from inside to produce intra-comet lakes, or a kind of base for the formation of organic compounds. This is why individual specialists do not rule out that comets played a certain role in the formation of the atmosphere and the ocean on earth. These are as yet, of course, merely hypotheses but it is excluded that thanks to the Vegas humanity will be able to delve into some of the riddles of the universe.

Sagdayev Comments on Findings

[Report by correspondent S. Slipchenko under the caption: Encounter With Halley's Comet, at 10 March News Conference in Moscow With Academician Roald Sagdeyev, "Scientific leader" of the "Vega" project, director of the Moscow Space Research Institute; portions within quotation marks are recorded —from the "Vremya" newscast]

[Text] "The journalists are (?impatient). They want to understand everything and feel the comet matter. However, Academician Sagdeyev, the scientific leader of the "Vega" project as he is now known, the chief author and executor of the idea of studying Halley's Comet, explained that the scientists work is only beginning."

[Sagdeyev] "Comrades, we are now at the very beginning of extremely long and laborious work in processing data from this experiment, because, as you can imagine, data acquired in real time in the space of a brief moment cannot be immediately presented as interpreted.

"The type of cosmic body which we have now encountered and studied at a close distance for the first time, and all the phenomena occurring around it up to a distance of millions of kilometers, is, as is now becoming clear, undergoing various stages of transformation: First, it is simply gas and dust, then plasma appears, followed by an interaction of all these elements with the interplanetary magnetic field. All of this which is now unfolding before us in its entirety is an absolutely amazing picture. However, we are still waiting for Giotto which should clear up, simply, very important final points. For we have not yet gotten closer than several thousand kilometers, where a cavity is expected completely devoid of a magnetic field. This is the ionosphere."

[Slipchenko] "Today's news conference was brief, because the leading scientists were hurrying to the Space Research Institute, to its rooms, where Moscow schoolchildren and children of foreign diplomats and scientists working in the Soviet Union were waiting. This was the first acquaintance with the secrets of the universe for Soviet and U.S. schoolchildren. Academician Sagdeyev and Carl Sagan, president of the U.S. Planetary Society, were perhaps more excited than at the news conference. Passing on the baton, they called the meeting for Halley's Comet approaches the sun and earth only once every 76 years and most likely only the youngest participant at this meeting will be able to see it on its 31st approach to earth. Scientists are now setting up a data bank on Halley's Comet for future generations. The children also were told about this. It may be possible perhaps in decades to come to escort the comet or take a sample of the nucleus matter. However, it is other generations of people who will be able to do this.

"Scientists of the international space experiment dedicated this meeting to Christa McAuliffe, the U.S. teacher who was an astronaut for only 74 seconds. The Vega experiment will provide information for basic sciences, will expand people's knowledge about the universe and about our planet, even the very first results reported today at the meeting with specialists are changing existing theories and ideas. Scientists are cautious in their assessments. All the same, here is some of the information they shared with me: The comet's nucleus is irregular in form; the comet's matter contains organic compounds; strong jets of gaseous emissions are observed from the nucleus; the emissions are now coming from the side illuminated by the sun. After processing [posle obrabotki budet priveden], a chemical composition, the mass of particles, and many other parameters of Halley's Comet will be deduced."

Press Conference Held

[Text] Moscow, March 7 TASS — TASS correspondent Rena Kuznetsova reports from the press centre of the USSR Ministry of Foreign Affairs:

The experiment of the direct study of Halley's Comet, which is extremely interesting for scientists, with the help of Soviet interplanetary stations, the first in the history of humanity, was discussed today at a meeting of heads of this most complicated project with Soviet and foreign journalists. All the data obtained in the course of the implementation of the Vega project, as well as information transmitted by the Japanese space apparatus and that of the European Space Agency will be brought together, analyzed and summed up.

Dr Vasiliy Moroz, a worker of the Institute of Space Studies of the USSR Academy of Sciences, who addressed the journalists destroyed the myth about the double nucleus of the comet, although some of the photos beamed to the earth showed something resembling it.

"Most probably, the central part of the comet has a complex structure. The nucleus itself is of irregular shape. Quite possible, it was the reason for distortions on the photos. A closer study of the photos makes us believe that there is a single nucleus. However, one cannot rule out a possibility of the existence of comets made up of two or more bodies," Dr Moroz said.

Scientists hope that the analysis of the data obtained will provide new information about the origin of our planet and of the universe. Perhaps, we shall be able to find and study the parent matter, the deputy science director of the Vega project Vyacheslav Balebanov said.

The idea was expressed at the press conference that if organic molecules were found in the comet matter, this would prove the hypothesis about comets being carriers of sources of life in the universe. Scientists do not rule out a possibility of the formation of pre-biological molecules in the interstellar space.

Crews Training for Mir Orbital Station

[Text] The main and backup crews chosen for a maiden mission aboard the Mir obiting station are completing their training in the Baykonur space center. The Mir, which belongs to a new generation of orbiting stations, was launched late last month. General Vladimir Shatalov, director of the Soviet cosmonauts' training program, has spoken highly of its capabilities, saying the station could receive six space ship at a time. The station is to help create a major scientific complex in orbit.

Artic Expedition in Chokurdah Meets Difficulties

[From the "Vremya" newscast; special correspondent A. Ukhov report and interview with pilot A.D. Koveshnikov from the KOMSOMOLSKAYA PRAVDA Artic expedition settlement of Chokurdah in northern Yakutia]

[Text] [Ukhov] From here the regular group of the expedition used to fly off to SP-26 [North Pole ice-floe drifting station No 26] and it is here that the group should be returning from the SP-27 drifting station. But on SP-27 the situation is now very complicated. The landing strip which the winter shift has been building for nearly 3 months has split. A fissure has split it in two, so the length of the strip is now only 600 meters. The situation is further compounded by the fact that the tractor has been left on a 300-meter fragment of the ice floe which is drifting further and further into the Arctic Ocean. Now everything depends on the skill of the polar aviators. The distance from Chokurdakh to SP-27 is nearly 1,300 km.

[Ukhov to pilot A.D. Koveshnikov] How will the expedition be lifted off?

[Koveshnikov] The situation to date has been rather tricky, but for polar men this is an everyday job. After preliminary reconnaissance, the AN-2 crews of our air unit will carry out the evacuation from SP-27.

ARBATOV VIEWS CPSU CONGRESS STAND ON DISARMAMENT

PM111449 Moscow KOMSOMOLSKAYA PRAVDA in Russian 11 Mar 86 p 3

[Remarks by Academician G.A. Arbatov, director of the USSR Academy of Sciences Institute of the United States of America and Canada, to "our correspondent" A. Baranov under the rubric "It Is Not Too Late!": "The World Is Too Fragile for Wars" -- date, place not given]

[Text] [Arbatov] The main feature of the Soviet Union's new peace proposals is certainly their unprecedented scale, complexity, and extremely concrete nature. Postwar history records many different initiatives and "packages" of proposals touching on particular aspects of the disarmament problem. But today we are dealing with a document of a fundamentally new nature -- an integral, detailed concept of ensuring international security. Some aspects of it were formulated by M.S. Gorbachev in his speech to French parliamentarians in October of last year and in subsequent speeches, particularly during the Soviet-American summit meeting in Geneva.

M.S. Gorbachev's 15 January 1986 statement contains proposals as a result of which these major ideas have, so to speak, acquired new flesh and become a program for mankind's liberation from the threats inherent in the existence and stockpiling of weapons of mass destruction.

Now, at the congress, the Soviet concept of international security has been presented to the world in detailed form. Let me remind you of its main provisions.

First, there is the conslusion that the security problem is essentially a political problem, and it is futile to attempt to resolve it by military-technical means. Not the arms race, but disarmament strengthens security.

There is also the awareness that in our age security cannot be achieved at the expense or to the detriment of others, that it can only be mutual (if we are talking about USSR-U.S. relations) or universal -- if we have in mind the international situation as a whole. Security today can only be security for all.

It is also obvious that although militarism is manifested more than ever before in U.S. policy, that policy does not accord with the United States' real national interest, not to mention the fact that the world is much bigger than the United States and cannot be reduced to it alone. It follows from this that the potential for peace is very great, even if you include the West in the reckoning.

Lastly, there is the need to realize that the world is very complex and is in the process of change; that nobody can freeze that process and fix the "status quo" forever; and that in the world arena the legitimate interests, both political and economic, of many states intersect and must be taken carefully into account, or else there will be no genuine security.

To sum all this up, there is the conclusion that the modern world has become too small and fragile for wars and strong-arm policies. It is necessary to break decisively and irreversibly with the way of thinking and acting which has for centuries been based on the acceptability and permissibility of wars and armed conflicts.

It is hardly necessary to mention the decisive significance which the task of putting an end to the arms race acquires in this connection.

That is the conceptual basis of the new Soviet proposals. Their main point, as is well known, is the program for phased nuclear disarmament, which it is proposed to complete by the end of this century. This all-embracing plan made a tremendous impression on the world public and, without exaggeration, has given rise to prolonged embarrassment in the governments of a number of states, above all the U.S. Administration. As American observers note, the USSR's initiatives put many Western politicians on the "defensive," since they were clearly unprepared for this turn of events.

A rather odd situation has arisen. Broad public opinion (including public opinion in the United States and Western Europe) supported the idea, the proposal to eliminate nuclear weapons. But many of those whom Western sociology calls "leaders" ["lidery"] (this means not only the leadership circles in this or that country, but public figures and politicians in general, experts, those who play a direct part in forming public opinion, and so forth) adopted a negative stance.

It seems to me that the Soviet proposals appear too radical for some of them. To some extent that is understandable. People are so accustomed to nuclear weapons and the foreign policy ideas arising from the existence of these weapons that they apparently cannot break out of the vicious circle, reorient themselves, and see that a decisive break with old ideas and a new way of thinking are necessary for survival, for the creation of really firm guarantees of peace. In response to the doubts expressed by such people, in his interview for the French Communists' newspaper L'HUMANITE, when asked whether a world without weapons, a world without wars is possible at all, M.S. Gorbachev said: "I would like to answer that question with another question: Is it conceivable to preserve human civilization by continuing the constantly accelerating arms race, whipping up tension, and balancing ever closer, so to speak, to the brink of war?" In other words, detente and the elimination of mass destruction weapons are not only the most desirable, but the only realistic ways of preserving "mir" [Russian word meaning "peace" or "the world"] in both senses -- both as the opposite of war and as the planet on which people live. Here other questions also suggest themselves.

If everyone (up to and including the U.S. President) agrees in principle that a nuclear war must not be waged and cannot be won, then how, one wonders, can the continuing nuclear arms race be justified?

It is far from easy for the United States to answer these questions, as was again shown in President Reagan's message to Comrade M.S. Gorbachev on the eve of the congress. The message was a strange combination of verbal assurances in support of certain ideas contained in the 15 January statement (including the idea of the need for the total elimination of nuclear arms) and numerous stipulations and unrealistic proposals -- a combination which only intensifies the doubts as to the present administration's willingness to take even the first step toward ending the arms race.

The strength of the Soviet proposals lies precisely in the fact that they present in United States and NATO with a dilemma: Either join in the good-neighborly quest for paths to disarmament, or expose yourself in the people's eyes and demonstrate that all your talk about the desire to save mankind from the threat of nuclear confrontation is mere hypocrisy. Of course, they try to avoid this choice under cover of all kinds of farfetched arguments and pretexts.

One of these is that the West cannot remain "nuclear-naked" (that is what they call it!), since the Soviet Union, they say, has superiority in conventional arms.

But M.S. Gorbachev has already said repeatedly that this argument is essentially incorrect -- the USSR has no such superiority. The Soviet disarmament program offers an opportunity for a sharp reduction in the level of conventional arms, too. This was stressed once again in the Political Report at the 27th CPSU Congress. It is all the more important to take this opportunity, because today these types of arms, or at least some of them, are approaching nuclear weapons in terms of destructive power.

Of course, we do not regard the 15 January statement as some kind of ultimatum, but as a basis for talks. However, as has already been agreed (and again confirmed in Geneva), this means talks with a specific, clear, unambivalent aim: to prevent an arms race in space and stop it on earth. We try to use all available means of persuasion and the force of example in this direction. To this end the USSR has taken certain important unilateral steps -- for instance, the reduction in the number of medium-range missiles in the European part of the country, or the imposition of a moratorium on nuclear explosions, including those used for the resolution of national economic tasks.

I would like to note another aspect, too -- the consistency with which the Soviet Union tries to clear away the obstacles to an agreement. One example of this is our position on the question of monitoring, of the verification of the agreements which have been concluded or are under discussion. "Disarmament without verification is impossible, but verification without disarmament is pointless" -- that is how Comrade M.S. Gorbachev defined the USSR's position on this question. And this position was reflected in concrete Soviet proposals on many questions, including the question of ending nuclear tests. This took away a favorite trump card from those of our opponents who have tried for a long time to speculate on this problem by depicting the USSR's position as an obstacle to the attainment of agreement.

Of course, the Soviet leadership is aware that all the problems raised in our proposals cannot be resolved at once. At the same time, as was noted in the Political Report at the 27th CPSU Congress, on a number of questions (in particular, the banning of all nuclear tests and medium-range weapons in Europe) a solution could be found rapidly -- before the new Soviet-American summit meeting which is planned for this year. That meeting will be pointless unless it leads to the resolution of some relatively major problems associated with the most important matter in relations between the two countries -- ensuring international security, lessening the threat of war, and limiting arms.

A serious debate is now taking place in the West, and that includes political circles and the broad public in the United States, too. A struggle lies ahead, in the course of which the polarization will be stepped up between the mighty forces of the military-industrial complex, militarist forces, and extreme right-wing politicians on the one hand, and on the other those sober-minded political and public circles which understand U.S. national interests differently, or, to put it more simply, correctly. This is no easy struggle. Those who advocate the arms race and "cold war" hold firm positions in the present U.S. Administration and in Congress. Another very substantial factor on their side is the force of many years of traditions which place the "right of the strong" above other arguments in the resolution of international questions. However, more and more people are realizing that continuing to follow these "traditions" today means subjecting all mankind to the threat of nuclear self-destruction.

Nuclear war is equally unacceptable to all the peoples. Moreover, it is obvious now that the arms race is also becoming unacceptable. Capitalism hoped, by imposing military rivalry on us, to undermine socialism's economic potential.

Now it is becoming clear that even for the richest Western countries -- I mean the United States -- the present military spending is an unjustifiable luxury which results in a state debt on a fantastic scale, in excess of $2 trillion. Subsequent administrations and subsequent generations of American taxpayers have to pay for the present crazy extravagance. But not only them. The existing financial and economic machinery forces other states -- including the poorest -- to pay for this extravagance on America's part (through high interest rates and the excessively high dollar rate).

Along with the economic problems which are the direct consequence of the arms race, the present U.S. course also gives rise to political problems. They include the growth of political disagreements between the United States and its allies, including disagreements over the "star wars" question. Many West Europeans are afraid that once it has protected itself with a "space shield" (in whose impenetrability, it is true, hardly anyone except President Reagan believes, not even many members of his administration), the United States will act in a more unbridled way in various parts of the world, including Europe, and might not withstand the temptation to risk even a nuclear clash.

The attention of millions of people is today fixed on the 27th CPSU Congress materials, in which there is a resolute appeal to prevent nuclear catastrophe and do everything possible to preserve the future for mankind.

CHERNYSHEV ON UK REJECTION OF SOVIET PROPOSALS

[Commentary by TASS military observer Vladimir Chernyshev]

[Text] Moscow, 11 Mar (TASS) -- As the PRESS ASSOCIATION hurried to report, Prime Minister Thatcher of Great Britain has given her response to the Soviet proposals of 1 January. According to THE FINANCIAL TIMES, the British prime minister rejected the key points of the USSR's proposals on nuclear arms control relating to the British nuclear forces. Officials have let it be known, the newspaper writes, that the British Government does not approve of any plan envisaging a freeze in the program for the buildup of Great Britain's nuclear armaments, and that nuclear weapons are essential "in the foreseeable future" as a factor of mutual restraint.

Quite recently the prime minister of Great Britain was fighting for the removal from Europe of Soviet medium-range nuclear missiles and, alongside several other West European leaders, she called for this problem not to be linked with strategic weapons and space. But now that the USSR has clearly expressed a willingness to act in precisely such a way and to totally eliminate Soviet and U.S. medium-range missiles in the European zone on a reciprocal basis, official London has completely lost its sham "enthusiasm." The realism and fairness of the Soviet plan have clearly not been to the taste of the London advocates of nuclear weapons.

What is going on? When you ask yourself this question, you cannot help recalling that it was precisely M. Thatcher who last year loudly repeated from the rostrum the not unfamiliar words of W. Churchill: "First and foremost take steps so as not to let nuclear weapons out of your grasp until you are certain and more than certain that you have in your hands other means of preserving peace." And the present prime minister is "taking steps," "not letting" nuclear weapons "out of her grasp."

And moreover, she was the first among the West European leaders to hitch her country to the U.S. "star wars" program in order to have involvement in space strike weapons and to participate in the development of this "means of preserving peace," as it is understood in Washington. One can hardly suppose that London does not realize that both Britain's refusal to make what contribution it can to the cause of reducing Soviet and U.S. medium-range missile in the European zone, and the continuation of the "star wars" program, are a barrier to activating the nuclear and space weapons talks in Geneva. What then is the worth of Mrs Thatcher's declarations, having stated once that these talks "hold hope for guaranteeing peace worldwide"?

How can the prime minister be concerned for the withdrawal of U.S. missiles from Europe if in February 1985, addressing the U.S. Congress, she took enormous credit for the very fact that Great Britain was the first country to deploy the new U.S. cruise missiles on its territory and "set an example to the other" West European NATO countries? And now again she has complete foundation for "boasting" over the fact that she is following obediently in the wake of the adventurist and militarist policy of those U.S. circles which are against measures to stabilize the international situation and remove the threat of nuclear disaster. It is a question of yet another manifestation of the rejection of Great Britain's national interests, a rejection which made itself felt recently in the Westland helicopter company affair, where Mrs. Thatcher gave preference to a pro-U.S. rather than a European approach.

The Tory government in no way wishes to abandon its own nuclear ambitions. It is not enough for the government that, owing to the military policy of the Thatcher cabinet, Great Britain has virtually been transformed into a "powder keg," the fuse of which stretches to the White House in Washington. Calculating in terms of per capita of population, the country now spends more than any West European NATO member on military needs, and its military budget, taking inflation into account, has been growing unceasingly now for 7 years.

The prime minister has again confirmed that her government remains firmly devoted to plans for equipping the British submarine fleet with Trident, a most advanced nuclear missile system. As is known, this will cost British taxpayers an astronomical sum -- in the region of 11 billion pounds. In this the Tory cabinet has ignored the opinion of the majority of Britons, who, as the results of public opinion polls have shown, are against this program and think that Trident missiles are nothing other than a nuclear first-strike weapon. As the British paper THE OBSERVER wrote, the acquisition of these missiles "significantly exceeds" even those requirements which Great Britain established for itself, having armed itself with the doctrine of "nuclear restraint." Such marked growth of the country's nuclear potential, THE FINANCIAL TIMES stressed, cannot be justified by any talk about "defense interests".

Thatcher's "answer" to the Soviet proposals, her decision not to stop the quantitative buildup of her corresponding nuclear arms, if a Soviet-U.S. accord is reached on the complete elimination of medium-range missiles in the European zone, and her confirmation of plans for a concentrated buildup of so-called British "independent nuclear restraint forces" cast doubt upon the sincerity of the British leadership's statements about adherence to the cause of peace and arms reduction. Giving an interview to the newspaper LA REPUBBLICA last year, Mrs. Thatcher said: "Europe is going resolutely forward, but I, following the example of schoolteachers, would write in the exercise-books of pupils, from time to time: 'You could have done better.'" Evidently, the world community can write on the British prime minister's "answer," with every reason: "You could not have done worse."

DELEGATIONS' 4 MARCH ACTIVITIES REPORTED

[TASS report: "Cordial Fraternal Meetings"]

[Excerpts] At the meeting between the Communist Party of Vietnam [CPV] delegation and the Soviet-Vietnamese Friendship Society aktiv it was noted that this mass public organization is the CPSU's active assistant in the all-around development of the two countries' fraternal relations. They are strengthening steadily in the spirit of the treaty on friendship and cooperation between the USSR and the SRV and the joint Soviet-Vietnamese declaration signed in June last year. Those taking part in the meeting wished the fraternal people advancing to the Sixth CPV Congress great successes in building socialism and defending their motherland.

Vo Chi Cong, member of the CPV Central Committee Politburo and secretary of the CPV Central Committee, stressed that the forum of the Communists of the Land of the Soviets and the documents adopted at it mark a new step in the life of Soviet society. They inspire the SRV people to further headway on the path of socialism, he stressed. Side by side with the Soviet Union, the Vietnamese working people are implementing social plans and link all their achievements with the cooperation and effective aid of the USSR. The guest expressed the certainty that the time-tested Vietnamese-Soviet friendship will continue to strengthen and develop.

The Mongolian People's Revolutionary Party [MPRP] delegation headed by J. Batmonh, general secretary of the MPRP Central Committee and chairman of the MPR People's Great Hural Presidium, was a guest of the Stavropol Kray agroindustrial complex.

A Soviet-Mongolian friendship meeting was held at the Konstantinovskoye village culture center.

Addressing those taking part in the meeting, J. Batmonh noted that the monolithic cohesion of Soviet people around the CPSU and the all-around labor enthusiasm with which the congress documents have been welcomed make an ineradicable impression. The delegation laid flowers at the monument of V.I. Lenin on Stavropol's central square.

The fraternal friendship of the Soviet and Bulgarian peoples is being enriched every year with real, specific deeds. This was stressed at a meeting between the BCP delegation and the collective of the Tbilisi "Elva" science and production association. "We are impressed by the businesslike, constructive nature of the Soviet Communists' congress," G. Filipov, member of the BCP Central Committee Politburo and chairman of the Bulgarian Council of Ministers, noted. "It may already be said with satisfaction that its decisions will be of exceptional importance not only for the life of the Land of the Soviets."

Talks were held at the Georgian SSR Council of Ministers and the republic's Academy of Sciences. The BCP envoys laid flowers at the monument of V.I. Lenin.

[TASS report: "Cordial Fraternal Meetings"]

[Excerpts] The names of the foreign parties and movements may vary, but they all share the same conviction that only the unity of communists and all the planet's progressive forces can make it possible to remove the threat of a new war and guarantee people their paramount right -- the right to life and the opportunity to advance down the road of peace and progress. This was noted during meetings between Soviet people and foreign guests at the 27th CPSU Congress on 5 March.

The BCP delegation headed by T. Zhivkov, general secretary of the BCP Central Committee and chairman of the Bulgarian State Council, visited one of the pavilions at the USSR Exhibition of National Economic Achievements, where an exhibition under the title "Science, Technology, Production 1986" is on display. The delegation members saw models of flexible automated production facilities that are to be introduced in the USSR national economy in the near future with the aim of promoting accelerated retooling of the economy.

Workers at Moscow's Ordzhonikidze Machine Tool Building Plant warmly welcomed the MSZMP delegation headed by J. Kadar, general secretary of the MSZMP. The fraternal country's envoys toured production facilities and heard about the collective's achievements in implementing the tasks of socioeconomic development. They inquired about progress in retooling the enterprise and producing new machinery.

The guests were greeted by A.M. Svyatenko, secretary of the plant party committee; Hero of Socialist Labor V.G. Komarov, a fitter; and K.I. Meshchankin, chief of the installation shop.

"The Soviet Communists' desire for peace and for the country's accelerated socioeconomic development, expressed at the 27th CPSU Congress, fully coincides with the Hungarian Communists' interests and plans," J. Kadar said. He spoke highly of the congress' work and emphasized its tremendous international significance.

The fraternal relations between the Soviet Union and Hungary, based on the principles of Marxism-Leninism and socialist internationalism, contribute to both countries' socioeconomic progress and to the strengthening of the entire socialist community, the MSZMP leader stated.

J. Kadar briefed those present on the work of Hungarian party organizations and labor collectives in implementing the decisions of the 13th MSZMP Congress. He emphasized that Hungary favors a further strengthening of fraternal relations with the CPSU and the Soviet people.

The PZPR delegation headed by W. Jaruzelski, first secretary of the PZPR Central Committee and chairman of the Polish State Council, visited Moscow's Metal-Cutting Machine Tools Experimental Scientific Research Institute Science-and-Production Association and the Stankokonstruktsiya plant. It toured production facilities and viewed the working and living conditions of the personnel at the association, which actively cooperates with allied enterprises in Poland.

A meeting was held between members of the delegation and the association's party and economic aktiv. The Polish leader expressed interest in questions of the further development of cooperation between the two countries' machine builders, the role of trade unions and working people in production management, and the effectiveness of the team form of labor organization.

The Polish comrades also visited the all-union arts exhibition under the title "We Are Building Communism," which is on display at Moscow's Central Exhibition Hall. The guests saw paintings, sculptures, and drawings depicting the Soviet people's achievements in all spheres of life.

The CPCZ delegation headed by G. Husak, general secretary of the CPCZ Central Committee and president of the CSSR, was warmly welcomed by the collective of the USSR Academy of Sciences and Ministry of Instrument Making, Automation Equipment, and Control Systems Institute of (Automation and Telemechanics) Control Problems. Long-standing cooperation links exist between this collective and the fraternal country's workers. Training of specialists for Czechoslovakia and joint research are a good tradition.

The peoples of the Soviet Union and Vietnam are proceeding shoulder to shoulder, jointly implementing the tasks of communist and socialist building and defending the cause of peace on the planet in single combat formation. This was emphasized by members of the delegation of the Communist Party of Vietnam [CPV] during their visit to the Moscow Mikromashina plant. The fraternal country's envoys were greeted by Yu.V. Loginov, secretary of the party committee, and director B.N. Lazarev.

The guests toured production facilities and inquired about their retooling and about efforts to improve the quality of household electrical goods. In conversation, the vanguard role of communists in the implementation of the enterprise's economic and social plans was noted.

"All progressive mankind is following the 27th CPSU Congress proceedings with great attention," Hoang Tung, secretary of the CPV Central Committee, stated. "Its decisions will have a great impact on the development of the international communist and workers movement. Strengthening the USSR's economic potential is one of the Soviet people's most important tasks, and so we sincerely wish the fraternal people success in translating the plans outlined by the congress into reality. Our participation in the work of the historic forum and conversations with the working class of the Land of the Soviets have provided us with a good opportunity to study the USSR's practical experience in the most varied spheres of life."

The MPRP delegation headed by J. Batmonh, general secretary of the MPRP Central Committee and chairman of the People's Great Hural Presidium, met with workers of the Trunovskiy agroindustrial association's Donskoy mechanized interfarm livestock fattening complex in Stavropol Kray. The fraternal party's envoys were acquainted with experience in the introduction and improvement of intensive techniques and the social restructuring of the country.

The Mongolian comrades described how, under the impact of the 27th CPSU Congress decisions, the Mongolian people in fraternal cooperation with the Soviet people are augmenting their efforts to further strengthen world socialism's economic potential and its prestige in the international arena.

The Hero City on the Volga fraternally welcomed the delegation of the Workers Party of Korea [WKP] headed by Kang Song-san, member of the WKP Central Committee Political Bureau and premier of the DPRK Administration Council. The WKP envoys were very interested to see Volgograd's F.E. Dzerzhinskiy Tractor Plant. Later, a Soviet-Korean friendship meeting was held in an assembly shop. Words of greetings were addressed to the guests by V.M. Babakov, secretary of the enterprise party committee; Hero of Socialist Labor M.K. Arkatov, a forge shop worker; and Valentina Ponomareva, secretary of the shop Komsomol organization. They declared that the people of Volgograd resolutely support the DPRK people's demands for a withdrawal of U.S. forces from South Korea and the transformation of the Korean peninsula into a zone of peace, and also the DPRK's efforts for the country's reunification on a peaceful and democratic basis.

The delegation head expressed profound gratitude to the CPSU and the Soviet state for their assistance in the liberation and national rebirth of the DPRK and their support in building a socialist society in the DPRK. He assured them that the WKP and the Korean people would continue to spare no effort to further strengthen the fraternal friendship and all-around cooperation with the USSR.

At the CPSU obkom the Korean comrades were briefed on the party organization's work in accelerating scientific and technical progress in industry and agriculture and on the oblast's development prospects in the new 5-year plan.

The guests acquainted themselves with the historic sites of the Battle of Stalingrad and visited the "Battle of Stalingrad" panoramic museum and the memorial complex on Mamayev Kurgan. They laid wreaths at the Hall of Military Glory. The WKP envoys honored the memory of the city's heroic defenders with a minute's silence. They laid flowers at the Eternal Flame on Dead Heroes' Square.

Meetings between the LCY delegation and Leningraders took place under the banner of international solidarity. The guests visited the Elektrosila Production Association, which has long-standing links with Yugoslavia. Turbine units and hydroelectric generators from this enterprise are in service at the Lukovac, Kostolac, and Djerdap-1 power stations. Close cooperation also links the Elektrosila workers with workers of Rade Koncar -- an allied enterprise in Leningrad's twin city of Zagreb. A.Ya. Kapustin, a turner and Lenin Komsomol prizewinner, spoke at the meeting with the guests about the fruitful development of these ties, which enrich the experience of socialist integration.

D. Belovski, delegation head and secretary of the LCY Central Committee Presidium, conveyed fraternal greetings from Yugoslavia's Communists and working class to Elektrosila.

"Lenin's city and its great sacrifices, which we hold sacred, are an example of heroic struggle against fascism and a symbol of courage and staunchness, he emphasized. One in ten Yugoslavs also died in the struggle for freedom against our common enemy. This is why we say that our friendship was sealed by blood jointly shed. We view with respect the efforts by Elektrosila workers to accelerate scientific and technical progress and enhance production efficiency.

"Every Yugoslav," the guest went on, "supports the USSR's initiatives aimed at preserving peace and preventing nuclear war."

The speaker said that the plans for cooperation between the two countries' peoples are defined in joint documents that are imbued with a feeling of friendship and a desire to strengthen these ties. It would like to assure the people of Leningrad and the entire Soviet Union that they have a friend in Socialist Yugoslavia, he observed.

The delegation members visited the Lenin memorial at Smolnyy and laid flowers at the monument to the leader. In memory of the Leningraders' exploits during the Great Patriotic War, the guests laid flowers at the Piskarevkoye memorial cemetery and on Victory Square, where the monument to the heroic defenders of Leningrad stands.

Members of the RCP delegation were received by scientists and production workers of the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences Ye.O. Apton Electric-Welding Institute.

"We are glad of the opportunity to visit the hero city of Kiev and the world-famous Institute of Electric Welding," C. Dascalescu, member of the RCP Central Committee Political Executive Committee and prime minister of Romania, said at the meeting with the collective of this major intersector scientific and technical complex. "Romania's Communists and working people follow the Soviet people's achievements in the development of the economy and culture and in the cause of enhancing living standards with great interest and sincerely rejoice in them, regarding them as a major contribution to socialism's increasing might and influence in the world."

The guest expressed satisfaction with the development of friendly relations between the RCP and the CPSU and between Romania and the USSR. He noted that with every passing year the relations of friendship and cooperation that have become a tradition are developing in the party and the state sphere and between mass and public organizations, between many cities, districts and regions of Romania and the Soviet Union, including the Ukrainian SSR.

"We are firmly convinced that, if we act jointly in the spirit of the accords achieved at summit level, Romanian-Soviet friendship and multifaceted cooperation will continue to deepen to the benefit and in the interests of the Romanian and the Soviet peoples and of the cause of socialism and peace." C. Dascalescu declared that Romania's Communists and all its working people fully support the new Soviet initiatives contained in M.S. Gorbachev's 15 January statement.

The members of the RCP delegation were acquainted with the latest work of the Paton Institute scientists, who maintain close contacts with Romanian scientific research organizations. Joint work with Romanian scientists and specialists on the implementation and practical application of the "Svarka" [welding] multilateral CEMA cooperation program has been proceeding successfully for over 14 years now.

The guests visited one of the major new housing areas, inspected an improved-design multistory block ready to be handed over for service, and visited a worker's apartment. Delegation members visited the "Ukrainian State Museum of the History of the 1941-1945 Great Patriotic War" memorial complex.

GORBACHEV ANSWERS INSTITUTE OF LIFE'S QUESTIONS

[All quotation marks as received]

[Text] Moscow March 11 TASS -- Professor Maurice Marois, founder and general delegate of the International Institute of Life which unites the efforts of scientists of different countries in the name of putting science at the service of preserving life on earth, has sent a letter to Mikhail Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee.

The letter said that the dialogue started in Geneva on November 19, 1985, can acquire historic significance if the top leaders of the Soviet Union and the United States speak out for life, urging all the world's nations to support programs covering the more important aspects of the relationship of science and society. It cannot be that man will fail to find solutions to problems he himself has posed. The ideas of the Institute of Life, the letter said, use the example of Louis Pasteur, a man of struggle and hope who believed unshakeably that the peoples will reach accord not to destroy but to create. Following is Mikhail Gorbachev's reply:

"Esteemed Professor M. Marois. It is with great interest that I read your letter sent to me and simultaneously to President Ronald Reagan. Thank you for the information about the activities and plans of the Institute of Life. As seen from your letter, the institute is concerned with really vital issues which in one way or another trouble any thinking person regardless of which country he lives in and even of what ideological views and political convictions he holds. The consequences of the use of newest technology for people's life; food resources and food; the environment and the living world; ethics and biomedicine; science, education, television and the future of humanity -- these and other subjects the Institute of Life is working on have been raised by life itself and are becoming ever more urgent, and sometimes acute and burning, with every passing year. Maybe not all have become aware of this as yet but all will come to feel and realize this tomorrow -- not later than by the next millenium. Here are my answers to your questions:

The first question: 'Do you think that from the biological, philosophical and political standpoints proclaiming life, especially human life, the supreme value is the priority task of our time?' I could answer this question in so many words: 'Yes, I certainly do.' But I would like to add this: The question you put has interested the best minds of mankind, one may say, ever since there appeared thinkers in the human race. But in our nuclear-space age it has acquired a new dimension and showed a new facet. F. Dostoyevskiy wrote in his time, which was in terms of history only recently: 'The mystery of human life is not in merely living but in what to live for.' I would not dispute this formula but just ponder the new content it is being filled with in the nuclear age. I would say that in our time it is worthwhile devoting one's life to saving the very life on earth. There is no goal more important.

"Such a problem has arisen never before in human history. But now it has presented itself, crudely and visibly, with ruthless implacability, in the most practical terms. Nobody can brush it away because it concerns all. And I am conviced that it should be solved by the efforts of the present, the living generation. We cannot, we simply have no right to turn the fulfilment of this task over to succeeding generations.

Either we shall accomplish it in the foreseeable historical time and deliver our children and our grandchildren from the heavy burden of existence under the constant threat of a probable and almost instantaneous self-destruction of humanity, or we shall not accomplish it : now and then, even if the worst does not come to the worst, it will be inconceivably hard or even impossible to accomplish it.

"The arms race has already brought mankind to a critical line beyond which it will be faced with the problem of whether it will be able -- considering the technical characteristics of new types of ground or space arms -- to curb this race. If we cross this line, life on earth will hang by a thread which may snap at any moment. No doubt, we must live and act in a new, different way in order to survive. This refers, in the first place, to the co-existence of states. It is their relationships that constitute the anatomy and physiology of what we call international life. Relations between states should rest on respect for mutual interests, primarily, for the interests of security that would be ensured by material, politico-legal, and moral-psychological guarantees, on cooperation both in the search for ways to save life and in the solution of a series of global problems on which the quality of this life depends. In other words, the old order of things, under which national security was seenllying, primarily, with military-technical solutions and power politics and under which the world has become a hostage of nuclear death, must give place to an all-embracing security system covering all spheres of international relations. Mankind can and must live in harmony with nature, but to be able to do so it must live in accord with itself. That is how the question was posed at the 27th Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union.

"Now your second question: 'Are you prepared, in the interests of organising a peaceful life on the planet and the flourishing of every individual and all people, to include the contribution of our 'Science at the Service of Life' programme in the perspective of cooperation and meetings between the two superpowers and of entire international cooperation?"

"In the first place I must say that we have never claimed and do not claim now the role of a 'superpower' and we believe that no one must claim this role if we are willing to rebuild international life along really new lines and thus preserve life on our planet. Present-day science and technology offer an opportunity to improve, in the full sense of the word, life on earth, to create conditions for an all-round development of every personality. But it is also they, the creations of man's mind and hands, that jeopardize the very existence of the human race. A crying contradiction! We want science to cease to be the servant of two masters, of life and death. We want it to serve life only.

"The ideas contained in the 'Science at the Service of Life' programme are essentially such that their real implementation presupposes the pooling of effort both by the USSR and the USA and entire humanity. In this light one will find understandable our affirmative answer to your third question: 'Are you prepared to consider the programme proposals to be worked out by the Institute of Life during the forthcoming international scientific conference which is to be attended mostly by scientists from the two superpowers?'

"We are ready to consider these proposals and to use them, with due account taken of their character, in practical politics.

"With deep respect and wishes of successes in your activities

[Signed] M. Gorbachev"

'AMERICANS WATCH' ALLEGES RIGHTS VIOLATIONS BY CIA

[T. Anatolyev "Rejoinder": "In the Light of Day"]

[Text] As is well known, the U.S. CIA does not like publicity. The CIA prefers to operate under cover of secrecy, shrouding its dirty deeds in a cloak of lies and disinformation. Recently, however, the U.S. espionage center's criminal deeds have been publicized increasingly often.

Recently the U.S. public organization, American Watch Committee, issued a statement exposing the CIA's direct responsibility for the flagrant human rights violations by the "contras" gangs, whose activity it finances and directs, and also for false information contained in those gangs' reports to the U.S. Congress.

On the basis of many witnesses' testimonies, American Watch accused the "contras" of the systematic torture and killing of Nicaraguans suspected of Sandinist sympathies. For example, last year alone, the statement says, gangs kidnapped and murdered around 90 Nicaraguans. Disseminating the deliberate lie about "human rights violations" by the Sandinist government, the CIA at the same time organizes with the "contras'" help veritable witchhunt of Nicaraguan patriots.

Thus the champions of "democracy" in Langley, where the CIA's headquarters are located, flagrantly violate the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Convenant on Civil and Political Rights, both approved by the international community of states, which ban the inhuman and brutal treatment of people, all forms of violence, experiments involving the use of drugs, torture, forcible deprivation of liberty, interrogations, and other interference of any kind in people's private lives.

And it is precisely in those matters that the CIA shows such zeal. And not only with regard to Nicaraguans. Suffice it to recall the U.S. speical services' outrageous and high-handed treatment of Soviet diplomat V.S.Yurchenko, who was humiliated for 93 days in the CIA's torture chambers. The Soviet diplomat described his experiences in an interview given to journalists and will be describing even more in his notes which he is preparing for publication.

According to the information of Americas Watch, many U.S. citizens are also being kept under surveillance by the U.S. special services. The persecution of those who disagree with Washington's foreign policy course is being intensified. A house subcommittee has conducted hearings on this question. Addressing those hearings, H. Burkhalter, member of the American Watch leadership, specifically stated that the CIA has prepared a secret report about a campaign of "disinformation" on the events in Nicaragua that is allegedly being conducted by a number of antiwar organizations in the United States. Prominent representatives of the U.S. press are increasingly frequently the target of CIA attacks, the participants in the hearings pointed out.

So the CIA's attempts to intimidate the public and silence witnesses are not achieving their aim. On the contrary, in the light of day one can see increasingly clearly the scale of the U.S. special services' crimes which, when highlighted, stand before the world in their true and vile complexion.

ARTICLES VIEW U.S. ATTITUDES ON PEACE ISSUES

[Own correspondent G. Vasilyev report: "When the Curtain Was Raised"]

[Text] Washington-New York, March -- It is as though a thick, impenetrable curtain was raised, and Americans saw a rare sight -- the streets of Moscow, the faces of Soviet people, the Kremlin Palace of Congresses. They heard in English translation excerpts from the CPSU Central Committee Political Report to the 27th party congress, delivered by M.S. Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee.

These were unusual days for millions of U.S. citizens, who are starved of information about the Soviet Union. True, there was no shortage of anti-Soviet fantasies, cliches, or attempts to interpret facts to suit bourgeouis propaganda. Despite all these distortions, however, the truths that Americans learned during the days of the congress about the Soviet people's life, about our plans for socioeconomic development, and about Moscow's peace initiatives made a deep impression here and forces people to think, to compare, and to contrast.

Indeed, there was plenty to compare. Events unfolded as if following a script specially designed to show everyone who it is that really desires peace and displays realism and a sense of responsibility, and who it is that, while holding forth about "peaceful intentions," steps up material preparations for war and continues to pursue the elusive specter of strategic superiority. The world was faced with two philosophies of international relations and two programs for practical actions -- the Soviet program of peaceful coexistence between the two systems with equal security for the sides under conditions of a reduction in the level of military confrontation, and the U.S. program of "peace through strength," of "peace" surrounded by growing mountains of destructive weapons.

The first reports about the CPSU Central Committee Political Report started arriving in the United States from Moscow on Tuesday, 25 February. Commenting on its foreign policy sections, observers admitted that the Soviet Union is consistently marching along the path it has elaborated, the path of peace and security for everyone, and returned time and again to the historic program for the total elimination of mass destruction weapons by the end of the present century and to the USSR's other peace proposals.

On the next day -- 26 February -- Americans watching their television sets heard U.S. President R. Reagan's address on military and foreign policy questions. The speech struck a note sharply discordant not only with what the Soviet Union is calling for, but also with post-Geneva sentiments in the United States itself. The President demanded the prevention of any slowdown at all in the pace of the U.S. military budget's buildup. He presented as the greatest achievement of his administration the fact that the years when the right-wing Republicans have been in power have seen the start of production of new weapon systems like the MX and Trident missiles and the B-1B and Stealth bombers and the deployment of Pershing-2 and cruise missiles in West Europe. Reagan repeated the bogus argument that has been actively used recently by advocates of the military-industrial complex: The buildup of U.S. military muscle, he claimed, is necessary for success at the Soviet-U.S. arms limitation talks. "Strength," the President declared, "is the most persuasive argument we have to convince our adversaries to negotiate seriously."

Local commentators hastened to explain that Reagan's address on national television was addressed primarily to the domestic audience, and that its main purpose was to exert pressure on Congress, which has recently displayed growing reluctance to approve in full the U.S. military budget requested by the administration for fiscal 1987. But neither the contents of the address nor the timing of its delivery left any doubt that this was at the same time a kind of "reply to Moscow," a reaction to growing pressure from the public, which demands from Washington constructive steps in response to the Soviet peace initiatives. All those who hoped for changes for the better in Soviet-U.S. relations could not but have experienced a feeling of profound disappointment with the U.S. President's address, couched in the vein of confrontational rhetoric. This feeling was particularly strong, since only a few days earlier the newspapers had reported the "U.S. reply" to the Soviet proposals of 15 January this year. Judging by what the newspapers wrote, the positive elements of this reply are lost among all kind of reservations, "provisos," and "conditions" that block the solution of specific disarmament questions.

The world waited almost 1 and 1/2 months to hear what the United States would say to the Soviet peace proposals. The press reported differences of opinion within the Washington corridors of power and a "painful quest" for a balanced answer that would calm the public's anxiety and would not prevent the implementation of military programs. Thus, it saw the light of day and was submitted at the negotiating table in Geneva.

Times in America are, however, different from what they were 5-6 years ago. Even though the incumbent administration is still the same and its policy has essentially undergone few changes, the mood in the country today is significantly different from that which predominated here in the initial period of political frosts and heated anticommunist speeches. The Americans' readiness to support the sharply anti-Soviet course and to vote for high military expenditure has noticeably diminished. A desire for changes and for a switch to calmer, more reasonable, and more realistic principles is clearly noticeable in the country's social climate.

On the very same day when President Reagan delivered his above-mentioned speech on television, the U.S. House of Representatives was the scene of sharp debates, extremely typical of the present stage. Despite desperate resistance from the most loyal backers of the White House's course, the legislators passed by 268 votes to 148 a resolution calling on the U.S. President to immediately resume talks with the Soviet Union for the purpose of concluding a treaty on the complete and general prohibition of nuclear weapon tests. The resolution also calls on the President to submit for ratification by the Senate the Treaty on the Limitation of Underground Nuclear Weapon Tests and the Treaty on Underground Nuclear Explosions for Peaceful Purposes, which were signed by the United States earlier but have still not been approved by the supreme legislative body. Congressmen Fascell, Downey, and Coughlin delivered very sharp speeches, testifying that many legislators do not share the basic postulates of the administration's strong-arm, confrontational policy.

"A threat to our very existence increasingly hangs over us," Congressman Studds exclaimed. "But this is not only a threat stemming from our rivals' weapons, it is also a threat stemming from the arms we ourselves are creating... The theory that new types of weapons and new technological breakthroughs will make the world secure and stable is one of the false gods of the nuclear age." And THE WASHINGTON POST remarked immediately that this significant step was taken by Congress the day after a call echoed again from Moscow, from the CPSU congress rostrum, asking the U.S. leadership to follow the Soviet Union's example and to join the Soviet moratorium on all nuclear explosions.

Life is a strict teacher, and only those who are incapable of drawing conclusions from the past fail to learn its lessons. Despite all the programs for America's rearmament, which have already cost the country 1 trillion dollars, in the opinion of all objective observers the United States has gained neither security nor military superiority over the Soviet Union. Political and economic pressure on the socialist countries and the attempts to exhaust them out by means of the arms race have failed to produce the results expected by those who hate socialism.

The mountains of arms have produced no political dividends for Washington, but have imposed a heavy burden on the country's economy, increasing the federal budget deficit to dangerous dimensions and resulting in the curtailment and elimination of social programs. Americans are practical people by nature. If something fails to work, they will try a different solution. The congressional debate on the requested new military budget totaling 320 billion dollars (an 11-percent increase compared with the previous year) and the unwillingness of many legislators, both Democrats and Republicans, to march in step with the administration are just one manifestation of this desire for changes and quest for alternatives.

Despite the apparently monolithic nature of Washington's foreign policy facade, the actual range of opinions and moods in the country is markedly broader and more diverse. Quite a few influential people here -- politicians, public figures, businessmen, labor union leaders, clergymen, and spokesmen of the scientific world -- are worried by the threat of a nuclear apocalypse. They are aware of the vital need to curb and reverse the race to the abyss. So far as they are concerned the Soviet proposals represent a good basis for the achievement of reasonable accords.

Senator Gary Hart is well known to us from numerous television reports in 1984, when he contested the Democratic Party nomination for U.S. President. He is boyish, with thick dark brown hair that is beginning to gray, and quick in his movements. Small lights summoning the legislators to another vote lit up constantly on the large clock in his office, but the senator did not wish to interrupt our conversation. Because, as he himself said, he believes that Soviet-U.S. relations are of decisive significance not only for the peoples of our two countries but also for the whole world. Under conditions when mountains of arms have been stockpiled, threatening the annihilation of all mankind, G. Hart developed his thought, the United States and the USSR bear not only a political but also a moral responsibility for the fate of peace.

The senator described the USSR's peace initiatives outlined in the Political Report to the 27th CPSU Congress as extremely positive and dictated by good will and the desire to achieve specific results.

A certain contradictoriness can also be discerned in the senator's statements. On the whole, however, the conversation with the legislator, considered to be one of the Capitol Hill's experts on military-strategic issues, gave the impression that one was face to face with a thinking man, a politician aware of the realities of our age. G. Hart said with great alarm that, unless the brakes are applied today, the locomotive of the arms race, and of the nuclear missile and space arms race in particular, could finally get out of control.

"I totally agree," he said "with General Secretary Gorbachev that there can be no security for one great power to the detriment of another's security, that new political thinking is required in our age..."

The White House, the lawn of the presidential mansion, and Pennsylvania Avenue with its speeding cars can be seen from the window of the office where Paul Warnke sits at his desk. Only a few hundred meters separate the offices of the Clifford and Warnke Law Firm from the "first house of the country."

But the political distance separating the former director of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency and head of the U.S. delegation at the SALT-II talks from the Reagan administration's course is much greater. Warnke believes that the policy of strength of the Republican administration, which has derailed the arms limitation talks, is detrimental to the country's vital interests. It is based on false premises that doom it to failure.

"As a participant in Soviet-U.S. talks," he said, "I can say most definitely that any attempt to deal with the Soviet Union 'from a position of strength' is a hopeless task. History has shown that arms limitation accords can be achieved only when this is in the interests of both sides and intensifies both sides' feeling of security."

Whence this divergence of views on Washington's foreign policy? Why did the age of "frosts" arrive after a period when the two countries managed to reach important accords? In Warnke's opinion, the point is that in recent times the upper hand in Washington has been gained by people captivated by images of the "Wild West" as depicted in Western movies -- walk into the saloon with pistols at your side, slam a fist on the table, and issue an ultimatum.

On parting, P. Warnke handed me the latest bulletin issued by the Committee for National Security, an organization he heads. Outlining the main provisions of the Soviet plan to free the world from nuclear weapons, the authors of the publication call on the U.S. Government not to miss this unique opportunity. "The United States and the USSR are at a crossroads," the bulletin says. "...We are faced with opportunities for deep cuts in both sides' nuclear arsenals and for prevention of an arms race in space..."

"Unfortunately," Warnke said, "many people's awareness lags behind the changing realities. Some of our people live in the past, when America, cut off by two oceans, was considerably stronger than everyone it came into conflict with, when it was able to dictate its will to others. That time is gone forever. And the sooner everyone realizes this, the better..."

U.S. ANTI-NICARAGUAN CAMPAIGN REPORTED, VIEWED

Reagan Hints at Intervention

LD090701 Moscow TASS in English 0610 GMT 9 Mar 86

[Text] Washington March 9 TASS -- U.S. President Reagan has again lashed out against Nicaragua. In his regular Saturday address to the nation on the radio, he made statements aimed at further boosting the current hysterical anti-Nicaraguan campaign in the capital of the United States. The slanderous campaign is used by the U.S. Administration get congressional approval for appropriation of 100 million dollars for "aid" to the counter-revolutionary gangs, President Reagan distorted the real facts and charged the Nicaraguans with "aggression" against the neighbour states. Yet he did not say a word that it is precisely the USA which is trying to overthrow the legitimate Nicaraguan Government by acting through the agency of the gangs of the "contras" formed by the CIA. In pressuring the Congress for the appropriation of military aid to the "contras", the President said that the voting scheduled to be held on that issue on March 10 would be of "paramount importance for the security of the United States. In doing so, he hinted meaningfully that it is only through the appropriation of military "aid" to the anti-Nicaraguan gangs that the congressmen will be able to prevent the "use of U.S. troops" in Central America.

Terms Aid 'Moral Duty'

[Text] Washington March 10 TASS -- America's moral duty, this is how President of the United States Reagan described the aid to gangs of "contras" who try to overthrow the lawful Government of Nicaragua. The President spoke in the White House today before representatives of various ultra-right organisations and heads of groupings of reactionary immigration. He drew them into an unprecedented campaign of pressure on the Congress which the administration launched in an effort to get the endorsement of its request for the appropriation of 100 million dollars as aid to terrorists. The President will be meeting congressmen every day this week, the last week before the voting in the House of Representatives on the request for aid.

As is known, the opposition to the U.S. policy with regard to Nicaragua is mounting on the Capitol Hill. Reagan himself had to admit today that he in engaged in a very difficult struggle against the Congress.

Bogomolov Comments

PM111111 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 8 Mar 86 Second Edition p 5

[Pavel Bogomolov "Commentator's column": "Escalation of Threat"]

[Text] Havana -- The provocative exercises recently held by U.S. naval forces off the shores of Nicaragua arenow being followed by a whole series of maneuvers involving the U.S. military launched near Nicaragua's land borders.

The territory of Honduras is the real bridgehead for the military preparations this time. Some 4,500 Pentagon officers and men took part in "Terencio Sierra-86" alone -- the joint U.S.-Honduran exercises that ended recently. In the immediate vicinity of Nicaragua airstrips are being completed that would be capable of receiving C-130 heavy transport planes used to ship U.S. invasion forces and combat hardware to "trouble spots." Honduras is also staging the "Cabanas-86" maneuvers involving subunits of the U.S. 83nd Airborne Division, which "won glory" for its reprisals against the Grenadians during the U.S. invasion of their island.

So events in Central America have reached the extremely dangerous point at which a direct threat of intervention against Nicaragua is created. That is also demonstrated by remarks by U.S. President R. Reagan, who is making increasingly frequent threats against the Sandinist revolution, and statements by Pentagon chief C. Weinberger, who has previously tried to justify the possible use of the U.S. military in the struggle against the Nicaraguan people.

The U.S. Administration is now striving, come what may, to secure from the Congress an extra $100 million for assistance to the Nicaraguan "contras." These attempts even arouse opposition on Capitol Hill -- a House committee and a House subcommittee considering this question have already rejected the White House pleas. In an attempt to force Congress to pay up, administration spokesmen are not only threatening to "send in the Marines" but are also going all out to kick up a militarist fuss near the Nicaraguan borders. The U.S. strategists are increasingly reminiscent of gamblers readyto risk all and to resort to all kinds of adventures. The present escalation of military activities is being justified by citing the notorious defense of U.S. "national security," as though little Nicaragua, the target of foreign interference and subversive actions by counterrevolutionaries, could "threaten" the United States.

It is obvious that this is not a "security" matter at all but Washington's proclaimed doctrine of "neoglobalism," which envisages flagrant interference in the affairs of sovereign countries and peoples and is a device used to fuel America's military preparations in Central America. Preparations which pose a new threat not only to that region but to the whole world.

U.S. BILL ON ANTITERRORIST ACTION ABROAD DECRIED

PM111025 Moscow IZVESTIYA in Russian 9 Mar 86 Morning Edition p 7

[Professor I. Lukashuk article: "Struggle Against Terrorism, or Neoglobalism?"]

[Text] The U.S. Senate has adopted a bill on prosecution for acts of terrorism committed against U.S. citizens abroad. To substantiate this document, its authors refer to the principle of international law according to which a country has the right to prosecute for crimes committed outside its borders when they are directed against its security or the exercise of its state functions.

Of course prosecution can take place if crimes most dangerous to a state are committed. But subsequent points in the bill provide for the prosecution of any persons who even attempt outside the United States to jeopardize business or residential premises or vehicles belonging to any American citizen. Thus, the draft law makes too broad an interpretation of the initial principle.

Further, a foreigner may be punished by a given state if he is on its territory. However, this fundamental point was not reflected in the bill in the requisite manner.

Such a free and broad interpretation of the law cannot fail to create misgivings. "Legitimate" grounds are being created for interference in other countries; affairs on the pretext of protecting American citizens and their property. It is known that this pretext was used for the invasion of Grenada and the overthrow of its government by force. Let us also recall the events connected with the Achille Lauro, when a foreign aircraft was intercepted in international airspace on the pretext of combating terrorism, and then an armed force was landed without permission on the territory of a sovereign state -- Italy. They are now trying to "legalize" this kind of activity.

This approach is in flagrant contradiction to international law. Even the American doctrine of international law agrees with this. As Professor M. Singer of Harvard University writes, "there is universal agreement that a state cannot invade another state's territory without its permission using any part of the law enforcement machinery -- judicial or executive."

The illegal broadening of the sphere of its laws' extraterritorial action is a manifestation of the distinctive U.S. "juridical neoglobalism." Underpinned by its dominant position in the capitalist world, the United States is seeking to subordinate other countries and their citizens and companies to its laws. For example, the United States tried to use its legislation for the purpose of underming the USSR's economic ties with Western states during the construction of the Urengoy-Uzhgorod gas pipeline. Even the EEC has declared that the U.S. measures "represent a radical broadening of U.S. jurisdiction -- which is illegal under international law." However, as M. Singer also stated, "the United States has to a significant extent totally disregarded protests against the violation of other states' exclusive jurisdiction."

The authors of the bill try to conceal the extention of the action of American laws to other states behind the mask of struggle against acts of terrorism. Terrorism really is one of the most serious crimes, which make all people of good will indignant. However, attempts to use the struggle against terrorist activity as a cover for neoglobalist aspirations will only help it to spread. The United States bears a considerable share of the responsibility for this. And this fact is indirectly acknowledged in the aforementioned draft law. It sates that there were more than 8,000 cases of international terrorism between 1968 and 1985. More than half of them were directed against American targets. A fact worth thinking about.

Crises and conflicts are rich soil for international terrorism. Undeclared wars and the export of counterrevolution in all forms are very dangerous manifestations of the state terrorism practiced by the United States. Terrorism begets terrorism.

Experience attests that only broad cooperation among states can bring success in the struggle against terrorism. But the method of one-sided strong-arm actions to which the United States has recourse, counting on its usual impunity, only creates conditions for the spread of terrorism.

U.S. ACCUSED OF 'FALSIFYING' SOVIET ARMS BUDGET

PM111300 Moscow KRASNAYA ZVEZDA in Russian 9 Mar 86 Single Edition p 7

[Commentary "specially" for KRASNAYA ZVEZDA by V. Bogachev, TASS observer on military questions: "The Myth of the 'Soviet Military Threat' Is a Tool of Deception"]

[Text] In his recent appeal to the country the U.S. President claimed that preparing for war is one of the most effective means of safeguarding peace.

Back in 1980 the leaders of the Republican Party proclaimed it as their aim quite unambiguously to achieve U.S. military superiority over the Soviet Union. A corresponding provision was included in the party platform adopted by the preelection convention.

Later, when the authors of the platform came to power in the United States, they were disappointed to discover that their aims of preparing for nuclear war and the course of military superiority aroused protests not only abroad but in the United States itself.

In order to justify preparing for nuclear war, the White House put forward a fantastic thesis about a "U.S. lag behind the Soviet Union in terms of virtually all indicators of military might." Contrary to elementary logic, the U.S. Administration started to convince Americans that the only reliable way toward disarmament lay through first building up U.S. military might.

It would probably be no exaggeration to say that in no sphere of political demagoguery has the deception of Americans by their government in this century reached such a scale as is now the case regarding the correlation between Soviet and U.S. forces in the military sphere.

Recently U.S. leaders have opened up a new sphere in the fantastic fabrications about the "U.S. lag." In his recent appeal to the country President Reagan demanded a new increase in military spending and, in order to "substantiate" his military program, cited absurd "figures" about the Soviet Union's military spending. He claimed in particular that over the last 15 years -- from 1970 through 1985 -- the USSR had spent $500 billion more on defense than the United States.

Just what portion of the Soviet budget, according to Reagan, was allocated to military needs? Let us do some basic arithmetic. U.S. military spending over the last 15 years amounted to $1 trillion 500 billion. Let us add to that -- as Reagan advises -- $500 billion and convert the total into rubles. It turns out to be around R2 trillion ($2.489 trillion).

As is well known, the entire Soviet budget in these 15 years amounted to R4 trillion. So it turns out that for all these years the USSR has been spending half of its state budget on military needs! The legitimate question arises: Can a state shoulder such a burden of military spending for 15 years, and in peacetime too? The answer, it seems to us, is obvious.

These pathetic "budget calculations" are as groundless as Washington's conclusions about the "violation of the balance of forces between the USSR and the United States" or the fantasies about the Soviet Union's tenfold superiority in terms of medium-range nuclear means. On the basis of the same "arithmetic" they turn the actual, more than threefold, U.S. superiority in strategic bombers into a Soviet "advantage."

Reagan's figure-juggling fully reveals the workings of the U.S. strategy of intimidating people with the "Soviet military threat," which the White House invariably uses to extort new appropriations for war preparations.

Is it not time for the United States to end the exercise of falsifying the figures about the balance of forces between the USSR and the United States, abandon the course of achieving military superiority, and seriously tackle the problems of arms reductions through honest talks?

ARISTOV RECEIVES JAMES GIFFEN FOR TRADE TALKS

LD121048 Moscow TASS International Service in Russian 1030 GMT 12 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow, 12 Mar (TASS) -- USSR Foreign Trade Minister Boris Aristov today received James Giffen, president of the joint U.S.-USSR Trade and Economic Council, who is in Moscow. A wide range of topics was examined concerning the state of and prospects for developing trade and economic ties between the two countries.

U.S.-SOVIET SHIPPING TALKS OPEN IN MOSCOW

[Text] Moscow March 11 TASS -- Prospects for developing Soviet-U.S. relations in shipping are the topic of discussion at the talks which opened here today. They centre, among other things, on possibilities for concluding a bilateral inter-governmental branch agreement.

A number of restrictions on calls by ships of the Soviet Union and the United States at their ports have been in effect since 1982 as a result of U.S. actions, which does not conform with world practice and the interests of shipowners. The Soviet side suggests creating a legal basis for regulating relationships in the field of sea transport in compliance with the universally recognized principles of the freedom of shipping. The sides failed to reach substantial accords on these issues at the talks held in Washington last December.

The agreements on sea shipping signed by the Soviet Union and the United States in 1972 and 1975 were in effect in the last decade.

TASS REVIEWS U.S. POLICY IN LATIN AMERICA

LD120745 Moscow TASS in English 0636 GMT 12 Mar 86

["Consequences of Washington's Policy" -- TASS headline]

[Text] Moscow March 11 TASS -- TASS news analyst Leonid Ponomarev writes:

On March 13, 1961, a quarter of a century ago, the U.S. Government advanced the programme of so-called social, economic and political development of Latin American countries, the programme that was named "Alliance for Progress."

The programme which applied to 19 countries of the continent meant one of the most subtle and scopeful forms of consolidating the United States domination in the Western Hemisphere. But its aim was, above all, to prevent revolutionary transformations, stifle liberation movements and the struggle against local oligarchies. The Bolivian newspaper "TARDE" wrote justifiably that U.S. monopoly capital cannot grant disinterested aid, since this would mean to give up vast profits drawn from Latin American countries.

Over 20 years, the "Alliance for Progress" programme was used for the pumping of profits from Latin America to banks in the USA.

Washington demanded from participants in the "Alliance for Progress" obligatory economic, financial, land and social reforms whose implementation would be agreed upon with the U.S. Administration. After numerous modifications of the U.S. policy in the region, the "Alliance for Progress" dissolved in subsequent programmes having the same aims. But the main principles of the programme and the mechanisms of Washington's manipulations in Latin America operate to this day. Latin America's huge foreign debt, mostly to U.S. banks, is a catastrophic consequence of such manipulations. Last year Latin America's debt surpassed 372 billion dollars, that is 972.6 dollars per capita.

Within the next ten years, Latin American countries must pay out 400 billion dollars of interest alone.

In one of its reviews, the United Nations Economic and Social Council noted that Latin America has been living through a most acute, profound and prolonged crisis over the past 50 years, the crisis that has most serious social and economic consequences. The policy of Washington that brazenly interferes in the affairs of the continent has a direct bearing on the plight of Latin America. This interference is supplemented now with the United States direct military threat in Central America. Thus, ignoring the efforts of a number of states, specifically member countries of the Contadora Group, aimed at a political settlement of problems in the region, the present U.S. Administration banks exclusively on military force. Striving to arm to the teeth the Nicaraguan "contras" -- former Somoza men and hired murderers from the CIA, Washington hopes to stifle the progressive regime in Nicaragua. Three weeks ago, President Reagan refused to meet foreign ministers of countries of the Contadora Group who arrived in the USA to support the Contadora process, while he gave a hospitable welcome to three leaders of "contras". This is the essence of the United States "alliance" with Latin American countries, the alliance of a robber and his victims.

HERITAGE FOUNDATION'S UN LIBRARY CHARGES REFUTED

["Slanders of the 'Heritage Fondation' Refuted" -- TASS headline]

[Text] New York March 11 TASS -- TASS correspondent Vyacheslav Chernyshev reports: The Department of Public Information of the United Nations Organisation has resolutely refuted the slanderous fabrications issued by the right-wing American "research" organisation "Heritage Foundation" against the library of the United Nations. The charges made against the library by that rightist centre, which is closely associated with the current U.S. Administration, are absolutely groundless and virtually wrong, the statement by the department says.

As has already been reported, the American rightists are extremely unhappy about the fact that the members of the missions accredited to the U.N. and the U.N. Secretariat can borrow at the library newspapers and magazines of the socialist and peaceable developing states and publications on problems of the struggle for peace and disarmament, against apartheid and racism, for a fair international economic order. All this is "inadmissible sedition" in the opinion of self-styled censors, who are not against bossing the U.N. library the way they do that at the school and university libraries of the USA, from which books by Mark Train, Theordore Dreiser, John Steinbeck and Kurt Vonnegut as well as many other writers have been banned.

They have demanded in the form of an ultimatum a change in the rules of the U.N. library, failing which they threatened all sorts of sanctions, which the Washington politicos so much like to use against that international organisation.

They on the banks of the Potomac are particularly displeased with the presence on the library's staff of employees from the USSR and the other socialist countries, which is quite natural for an international organisation. They have floated a rumour about some "red dominance" in the library. But how do matters actually stand? The Public Information Department easily exposed the professional liars from the "Heritage Foundation". Twenty-three posts out of 64 on the staff of the U.N. library are occupied by citizens of the USA, while there are only eight librarians from the USSR and the Ukrainian SSR. The remaining jobs are occupied by citizens of the West European countries, Japan and non-aligned countries.

PROPOSED U.S. MISSILE SALE TO SAUDI ARABIA NOTED

LD111931 Moscow TASS in English 1921 GMT 11 Mar 86

[Text] Washington March 11 TASS -- The White House announced today that President Reagan has decided to sell a large consignment of anti-aircraft missiles to Saudi Arabia. An official notification to this effect is sent to the United States Congress. In the framework of the deal whose value is estimated at 354 million dollars, the United States will sell "Sidewinder", "Harpoon" and "Stinger" missiles to Saudi Arabia. The report stresses that the missile delivery is aimed at meeting Saudi Arabia's "vital needs" in the sphere of security.

Observers hold that Washington thus hopes to persuade Riyadh to back its Middle East policy.

CSSR'S CHNOUPEK PRAISES CPSU CONGRESS PROPOSALS

LD120844 Moscow TASS in English 0828 GMT 12 Mar 86

[Text] Prague March 13 TASS -- The socialist countries' international activity and their steadfast commitment to peace and international security are in line with the goals of the U.N.-proclaimed International Peace Year, Czechoslovak Foreign Minister Bohuslav Chnoupek said at a meeting of the Czechoslovak Commission for observing International Peace Year.

He said that the humanism and peaceful nature of the socialist states' policy of fending off the threat of a nuclear war, achieving peaceful solutions to international conflicts, fostering an atmosphere of trust, promoting disarmament and making certain that outer space is used exclusively for peaceful pursuits have been strikingly demonstrated by the 27th Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union.

Speaking there, Mikhail Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, presented a scientifically grounded plan to preserve world peace, which offers answers to the urgent problems of the times and makes comprehensive proposals for their resolution, Chnoupek said in his speech which was published in today's newspapers. He said the peace proposals advanced at the 27th Congress of the CPSU are innovative, bold, straightforward and convincing.

They inspire efforts to avert a nuclear disaster, bring about disarmament and speed the all-round development of humanity, and spotlight the goals and ideals of International Peace Year, Chnoupek said.

The Soviet Union's latest initiatives which, once fulfilled, will enable mankind to enter the third millenium in peace mark a new stage in the history of nations, the Czechoslovak foreign minister said. Concrete, daring and realistic, they show a road to peaceful coexistence and detente and suggest ways of saving mankind from the threat of war.

The Czechoslovak foreign minister went on to say that his country will carry on its policy of strengthening cooperation and coordinating its actions with the other Warsaw Treaty member states and continue to unwaveringly uphold the ideal of peace and cooperation. "We are proud," he said, "that in these efforts for progress and the triumph of reason Czechoslovakia is in the same ranks with the Soviet Union."

REPORTAGE ON SPANISH NATO REFERENDUM

International Pressure Noted

LD112224 Moscow Domestic Service in Russian 1600 GMT 11 Mar 86

[Correspondent Valentin Gorkayev report from Madrid]

[Text] One day before the referendum, which will resolve the issue of whether Spain will leave NATO or remain in this military bloc, the situation in the country is quite tense. The fact that Prime Minister Felipe Gonzalez, along with other members of the government, has recently appeared daily on radio and television, giving interviews to newspapers and magazines trying to demonstrate the need for Spain to be in the North Atlantic alliance, shows just how heated the political struggle is. Pressure has also been stepped up on the Spanish from abroad: Mario Soares, president of Portugal; Italian Prime Minister Bettino Craxi; FRG Chancellor Helmut Kohl; and U.S. Vice President George Bush; have recently called urgently on Spain to remain in NATO.

How can one explain such broad and unconcealed pressure on the Spanish from abroad, and the unprecedented efforts being made by Spanish Socialists to tip the scales in favor of continued Spanish membership of NATO? Without any doubt, this is all being done due to the anxiety which is aroused in them by the latest public opinion polls. Although as a result of a broad propaganda campaign by the government the number of supporters of the country remaining in the North Atlantic alliance has risen somewhat, a week before the referendum, however, those who are against NATO remain in the majority. The referendum will show to what degree the last week has influenced the attitude of the fairly large number of those who are wavering. Its preliminary results will be known on Wednesday, 19 March, at approximately 1900 hours Moscow time.

'Franco Link' Viewed

LD111916 Moscow Television Service in Russian 1545 GMT 11 Mar 86

[From "The World Today" program presented by Farid Seyful-Mulyukov]

[Excerpts] You already know that a general referendum is being held tomorrow in Spain during which inhabitants of the country are to voice their opinion on the subject of Madrid's membership of NATO.

Madrid is being given powerful political and propaganda support in this by Washington and other Atlantic capitals, for whom Spain's participation in NATO is not just a question of prestige, but also a question of strengthening the Mediterranean flank of the aggressive bloc. It is precisely to this region that the United States attaches particular significance in its neo-globalism plans, both in the fight against European socialist countries and for subjecting North African and Middle Eastern states situated in the Mediterranean Sea basin to its influence.

The broad anti-U.S. movement in Spain serves as the mainspring of the anti-NATO movement. The overwhelming majority of Spaniards are in favor of the eliminating of U.S. military bases which were set up as early as the times of the dictatorial Franco regime. Links established during those years between Washington and Madrid were so close that the Spaniards' bad memories about this period live on even many years after the death of Franco. However, the matter does not concern feelings alone, the matter is, first and foremost, of politics.

Many Spaniards are well aware that the U.S. bases on the country's territory are closely tied up with Washington's nuclear strategy and represent a serious threat to the security and sovereignty of Spain. Expansion and strengthening of the position of the aggressive NATO bloc is not only an anachronism in the light of the present antiwar moods in Europe, and in Spain itself, but also an attempt by Washington and other Atlanticists to aggravate further still the situation on the European continent. Millions of Spaniards have responded keenly to the Soviet peace initiatives, which were again confirmed from the rostrum of the 27th CPSU Congress. These initiatives have clearly shown that it is a policy of peace and ridding the earth of nuclear arms is the only alternative to preparations for nuclear war and the strengthening of military blocs. And, whatever the outcome of tomorrow's referendum in Spain, this policy is carving its way everywhere, including the Pyrenees.

PRAVDA DEPLORES ITALIAN ACCESSION TO SDI

[Article by Nikolay Prozhogin: "Washington's Star Bridle"]

[Text] News agencies have reported that the Italian Government has given the "green light" to participation by the country's industrial companies and firms in the American "star wars" program. This decision was taken at a session of a special interministerial committee headed by Bettino Craxi, chairman of the Council of Ministers. Italy has thereby become the third West European state after Britain and the FRG to join the Pentagon's dangerous plans to create space-based strike weapons.

In accordance with the now familiar scenario developed in Washington, U.S. allies are assigned a secondary role for the fulfillment of which they are promised the reward of an as yet unestablished honorarium plus an additional reward in the form of access to the "latest American technology." Some capitalist entrepreneurs have swallowed the bait. Dreaming of immediate, albeit highly problematical profits, and ignoring the threat to mankind concealed in the "star wars" plans and, consequently, the threat to themselves, they are joining the queue for dollar handouts, thereby contributing to the Washington star bridle being thrown over their countries.

It would seem that political figures should be more circumspect. Indeed, it cannot be said that the plan for "star wars" preparations has not aroused keen discussion in Italian political spheres. Voiced in the course of these discussions in particular were well founded fears that implementation of this plan would block a solution to the problem of nuclear arms reduction and elimination. And this problem is particularly painful for Italy, which, having already granted its territory for the deployment of American cruise missiles, has placed itself in the position of a Pentagon nuclear hostage.

However, on the question of joining "star wars," the Italian Government proved unable to stand its ground in the face of pressure from Washington. Meanwhile, the pressure from the other side of the ocean is not letting up. Now, in an attempt to draw its West European allies still deeper into its militarist preparations, Washington is demanding not only actual participation by foreign companies and firms in its "star wars" preparations, but also official support for SDI at a state level, that is, the signing of corresponding intergovernmental agreements. "The United States is pressing its allies and waiting for West European governments to join its project," Italy's ANSA news agency reports, commenting on the talks being held in the Pentagon by an Italian delegation which includes both representatives of a number of state and private companies and high-ranking officials from ministries in Rome.

In this connection it is useful to once again recall the appeal made from the 27th CPSU Congress rostrum to the leaders of states with different social systems to adopt a responsible attitude to the key problem of world politics today -- the problem of war and peace. No sober-minded statesman has the right to evade this responsibility.

SPD URGES FRG TO 'RENOUNCE' SDI PARTICIPATION

LD112024 Moscow TASS in English 2001 GMT 11 Mar 86

[Text] Bonn March 11 TASS -- The Presidium of the Board of the Social Democratic Party of Germany (SPD) issued a statement here today urging the West German Government to renounce the participation in the U.S. "star wars" programme and also in the implementation of the so-called "European Defence Initiative", a West European equivalent of the U.S. project. The leading body of the West German key opposition party demanded that the West German Government come out immediately for terminating all nuclear weapon tests, freezing nuclear arsenals and oppose the deployment of medium-range nuclear weapons in Europe.

UK BARS PENTAGON 'CONSULTANTS' FROM SDI FIRMS

PM111121 Moscow KRASNAYA ZVEZDA in Russian 9 Mar 86 Single Edition p 7

[TASS report: "Explanations Demanded"]

[Text] London, 8 Mar — The British secretary of state for defense has demanded an explanation from the Pentagon regarding the visit by a group of high-ranking "consultants" from across the ocean headed by K. Robinson, the FINANCIAL TIMES, the well-informed organ of British business circles, reports. The officially declared aim of the visit, the newspaper points out, was the intention to "study" those sectors of British industry which will participate in implementation of the American "star wars" program. However, in actual fact the transatlantic visitors intended to carefully check activities of British companies and convey this information to a special Pentagon department which, in the opinion of the FINANCIAL TIMES, is compiling a "top-secret list of important military technology." This is connected with the U.S. military department's plan to classify as top secret the developments of firms which have expressed willingness to cooperate in implementation of the SDI program.

This inevitably means that Britain will have to pay for participation in SDI both by having its national sovereignty undermined and by having its own industrial development retarded. Companies appearing on the Pentagon's secret list, the newspaper points out, would be deprived of the right to apply their technology in the production of non-military products. The blatant nature of this encroachment by the American military on the sovereign rights of another country has forced even the conservative British Government -- a government which usually obediently supports Washington's militarist undertakings — to stop and think. The secretary of state for defense refused to permit the transatlantic "consultants" to hold talks with British companies. K. Robinson was forced to hastily curtail his visit.

NICARAGUA'S ORTEGA GREETS GORBACHEV ON CONGRESS

[Message from Nicaragua's Daniel Ortega to M.S. Gorbachev under the general heading "Foreign greetings in connection with 27th CPSU Congress"]

[Text] Esteemed Comrade Gorbachev!

On the occasion of the 27th CPSU Congress, I send you greetings from the Sandinist National Liberation Front and the Nicaraguan Government and people.

The 27th CPSU Congress demonstrates the steady development of the Soviet state, which under V.I. Lenin's leadership began its historic path at the beginning of this century. All mankind knows about the Soviet people's contribution to the victory over Hitler's hordes.

The assistance which the USSR gives to different peoples and states of the world is generous and selfless. The USSR also gives invariable political and moral support to liberation movements which, like the Sandinist revolution, are the target of the present U.S. Administration's bellicose policy of state terrorism.

The Nicaraguan people are confident that the cause of world peace and the concrete tasks in this sphere for which the Soviet people are struggling [as published] under the leadership of the CPSU and the Soviet Government, and the recent peace initiatives of 15 January this year will continue to make headway and will prevail over the policy which threatens the annihilation of all mankind. During the work of the 27th CPSU Congress, we send our fraternal greetings to you, esteemed Comrade Gorbachev, to the members of the CPSU, and to the heroic Soviet people.

Fraternal greetings,

[Signed] Daniel Ortega Saavedra

Basic Guidelines for Economic, Social Development

PM091342 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 9 Mar 86 Second Edition pp 1-6

["Basic Guidelines for the Economic and Social Development of the USSR for 1986-1990 and the Period Through the Year 2000" — PRAVDA headline; the draft version of the Basic Guidelines was published in the 12 November 1985 supplement to the Soviet Union DAILY REPORT]

[Text] In a historically short time our country has risen from age-old backwardness to the heights of social progress and achieved outstanding successes in all spheres of life. Soviet society has entered the stage of developed socialism.

A powerful economic, scientific, technical, and cultural potential has been created by the labor of generations of Soviet people. The USSR now has highly skilled cadres and possesses a powerful industry, a large-scale mechanized agriculture, and a comprehensively developed infrastructure. The country occupies leading positions in the world in many areas of scientific and technical development. The population's prosperity is growing constantly, the socialist way of life is improving, and the principle of social justice is being realized increasingly fully.

The crises, poverty and unemployment, and class and national enmity inherent in the capitalist system have vanished irreversibly into the past. Equality, cooperation and mutual assistance among people and real democracy have been established. The advantages of the planned economic system and of the people's socialist self-management and the working masses creative potential are being revealed increasingly fully. The community of fraternal socialist states — bastion of peace and social progress — is strengthening.

Unswervingly following V.I. Lenin's behests, the Communist Party is confidently leading the Soviet people along the path of the improvement of socialism and further progress by Soviet society toward communism on the basis of the strategy elaborated by the 27th CPSU Congress to accelerate the country's socioeconomic development.

The Basic Guidelines for the Economic and Social Development of the USSR for 1986-1990 and the Period Through the Year 2000 determine specific plan targets for implementing the CPSU's program goals.

I. Basic Results of the Country's Economic and Social Development for 1981-1985

In the course of fulfilling the 26th CPSU Congress decisions a major new step was taken in boosting Soviet people's prosperity and developing all sectors of the economy.

The country's economic potential increased considerably. National income increased 17 percent in comparison with 1980. More than R840 billion in capital investments was channeled into strengthening the material and technical base of the national economy and building housing, sociocultural, and other facilities. About 1,000 modern new industrial enterprises were commissioned.

Work to accelerate scientific and technical progress and retool and modernize existing production was stepped up. Production of over 19,000 new types of machinery, equipment, apparatuses, instruments, and other industrial output was started up. The introduction of low-waste, waste-free, and energy- and material-saving manufacturing processes and machine systems expanded.

Positive results were achieved in intensifying production and increasing its efficiency. Almost 90 percent of the increase in national income was obtained through social labor productivity growth. Production discipline improved and losses of work time declined. More economical use of material resources began to be made.

The leading sector of the economy — industry — underwent further development. The increase in industrial output totaled 20 percent. Consumer goods production (group "B") increased more rapidly than production of means of production.

The USSR Energy Program is being fulfilled. Nuclear power developed at an accelerated rate — it accounts for one-tenth of all the electricity produced in the country. The Soviet Union, which previously ranked first in the world in terms of oil extraction, reached the same position in gas extraction during the current [as published] 5-year plan. Some 48,000 km of main and branch gas pipelines were built.

The party's agrarian policy was unswervingly pursued, and the USSR Food Program was consistently implemented. One-third of all capital investments were channeled into strengthening the material and technical base of kolkhozes and sovkhozes and the entire agro-industrial complex. Kolkhoz and sovkhoz economies are strengthening. The subsidiary farms of enterprises and organizations and also of urban and rural inhabitants are undergoing development. Construction of housing and sociocultural facilities was carried out at high rates in the countryside.

Production and purchases of the basic types of agricultural products increased. Average annual gross agricultural output increased by 6 percent and reached R131 billion. Meat production increased 9 percent and egg production 18 percent in comparison with the 10th 5-Year Plan. The vegetable and fruit crop increased considerably.

Freight turnover in transport increased 15 percent. Operational train traffic was inaugurated on the Baykal-Amur Main Railroad, which is of great significance for the development of Siberia and the Far East.

The people's material and cultural living standards rose on the basis of the upsurge in the economy and the growth of its efficiency. Per capita real incomes increased 11 percent.

Average monthly wages of workers and employees increased 13 percent and reached R190 in 1985. Kolkhoz members' labor remuneration from social production increased 29 percent and totals R153 per month.

Important centralized measures were implemented in the field of labor remuneration. The wages of workers and employees in the coal industry and of a considerable proportion of agricultural workers were increased. Planned measures to increase the wages of public education workers are being implemented. Additional benefits were established for a number of categories of light and food industry workers. Length-of-service awards were introduced in railroad and river transport contract construction organizations and certain other sectors. Labor remuneration of over 20 million people increased as a result of the implementation of these measures.

Payments and benefits from social consumption funds increased 25 percent and reached approximately R530 per capita in 1985.

The material and everyday living conditions of Great Patriotic War veterans and the families of deceased servicemen were improved. Minimum pensions for workers, employees, and kolkhoz members were increased. Pensions were increased for a large group of workers and employees who retired for a well-earned rest more than 10 years ago. Additional continuous-service increments to pensions were introduced.

Major measures were implemented to help families with children and working mothers. Partially paid leave for caring for a child until it reaches 1 year of age was introduced for mothers, and one-time birth grants were increased.

Catering expenditure norms in preschool establishments and residential schools were increased, and the provision of free textbooks for general educational school students was introduced.

There were annual repayments of state loans previously raised on a subscription basis among the population.

The population's requirements for many goods and services began to be satisfied more fully. There was an increase in consumption of vegetables, fruits, eggs, meat, and other nutritionally most valuable products. Retail trade turnover increased 16 percent, and the volume of consumer services provided to the population increased by one-third.

The housing problem is being consistently solved. A total of over 550 million square meters of apartment blocks was commissioned, enabling more than 50 million people to improve their housing conditions. The standard of facilities provided in housing improved.

Medical services and recreation conditions for the population improved. Substantial measures to protect the environment were implemented.

The public education system developed, and the implementation of the reform of general educational and vocational schools began.

Culture and art developed. The activity of cultural enlightenment institutions and the mass information and propaganda media improved.

The union republics' economies grew on a plan-governed basis, and the contribution made by each of them to resolving statewide tasks increased. The shaping and development of large-scale territorial production complexes continued. The natural wealth of the country's eastern and northern regions was opened up at an accelerated rate. West Siberia now provides two-thirds of all-union oil extraction and over half the gas extraction.

The measures to improve administration and economic management and strengthen discipline and organization in all components of the national economy were of great significance.

Economic experiments aimed at expanding the economic autonomy and intensifying the responsibility of associations and enterprises and at achieving higher end results of production on this basis are being implemented in industry, agriculture, and other sectors. Financial autonomy is being strengthened. Effective forms and methods for the collective organization of and provision of incentives for labor, primarily those based on the team contract, were extended.

The role of the soviets of people's deputies, trade unions, and the Komsomol in economic and cultural building has grown. Working people's participation in management expanded, and the USSR Law on Labor Collectives was adopted and is being implemented. The masses' labor activeness grew, and the organization of socialist competition improved.

Our country is playing an increasingly active role in the international division of labor. The Soviet Union's cooperation with the CEMA countries and other socialist states strengthened considerably, and socialist economic integration deepened. The measures envisaged by the decisions of the CEMA economic summit conference were implemented.

Foreign trade turnover increased and economic ties expanded. The USSR now has trade relations with 145 countries.

At the same time a slowing of development rates occured in the development of the national economy, and the implementation of production intensification and of the restructuring of the production structure and administrative and economic management methods was lax. The rate of assimilation of new equipment and technology in production was inadequate. The technical standard and quality of many products, including consumer goods, fell short of modern demands. There were violations of contractual discipline relating to product supplies. Some republics, ministries, associations, and enterprises did not reach the levels mapped out by the 5-year plan for production volume, labor productivity, prime cost of products and operations, savings of material resources, and commissioning of production capacities. This led to a gulf developing between social requirements and the achieved level of production, between effective demand and its material satisfaction. There are difficulties in providing the population with individual food products.

In connection with the exacerbation of the international situation, the USSR was compelled to make additional efforts to maintain its defense capability at the requisite level in order to guarantee a peaceful life for our people.

In general, the results of the outgoing 5-year period testify that our country advanced in all areas of economic and social development.

II. Basic Guidelines and Tasks of the Economic and Social Development of the USSR for the Period Through the Year 2000

The 15-year period on which our country is embarking is an important historical period along the path of improving socialism and building communism.

The supreme goal of the party's economic strategy has been and remains to steadily boost the people's material and cultural living standard. The attainment of this goal in the coming period demands the acceleration of socioeconomic development, comprehensive production intensification, and an increase in production efficiency on the basis of scientific and technical progress. It is necessary to raise productive forces and production relations to a qualitatively new level, to fundamentally accelerate scientific and technical progress, to ensure rapid progress along the strategic avenues of the economy's development, and to create a productive potential equal in size to the potential accumulated during all preceding years of Soviet power.

On the basis of this premise, during the period through the year 2000:

A further boost of the prosperity of all strata and social groups of the population and profound changes in the sphere of labor and people's living conditions are to be ensured. The social orientation of the economy's development is to be stepped up, together with the trend toward creating the best possible conditions for the harmonious development of the individual and the consolidation of the socialist way of life, and the increasingly full realization of the principle of social justice.

A broad social program is to be implemented. Real per capita incomes are to increase 60-80 percent.

The social prestige of high-quality labor and professional skill is to be enhanced. Labor remuneration is to rise in line with labor productivity growth, and the forms of labor remuneration are to be improved. The policy of increasing minimum wages and cutting back the taxes collected from the population will continued to be pursued. Paramount attention is to be devoted to stepping up moral incentives for labor collectives and individual workers. Awareness of the need to work conscientiously for the common good and a sense of personal responsibility to society for the results of labor must be more actively inculcated in each person.

Full and rational employment of the population is to be ensured. Conditions of labor are to improve substantially, the faster reduction of manual labor is to be sought, and its share in the production sphere is to reduced to 15-20 percent. Opportunities for the development and application of all citizens' creative abilities are to be expanded.

Soviet people's needs for diverse, high-quality goods and services are to be more fully satisfied. The level of scientifically substantiated norms for the rational consumption of food products and basic nonfood goods is to be reached for a significant range of goods, and approached as closely as possible for the remainder. The volume of retail trade turnover in state and cooperative trade is to increase approximately 80 percent. A highly developed services industry is to be created, and on this basis the amount of labor consumed by housework is to be sharply reduced. The improvement of consumption standards, the shaping of sensible needs corresponding with the socialist way of life and according with the harmonious developments of the individual, and the elevation of man's spiritual requirements are all to be encouraged.

The most important social task of providing practically every family with a separate apartment or individual home is to be consistently resolved. A total area of no less than 2 billion square meters of housing is to be commissioned. Services and amenities in the city and countryside and the state of repairs of the housing stock are to be improved.

The line of accelerated growth of social consumption funds, which are an important means for the further development of statewide systems for free national education, health services, and social security and for the improvement of conditions for working people's leisure, is to be continued. The volume of these funds is to approximately double.

A demographic policy taking the specific features of the country's different regions more fully into account is to be pursued. The prolongation of the population's life expectancy and working life, the consolidation of the family, the creation of more favorable conditions for raising the growing generation, and the combination of motherhood with women's active participation in labor and social activity are to be encouraged by all means. State assistance to families with children and young families is to be expanded and improved.

The level of material support and of social and consumer services for war and labor veterans, elderly citizens, and disabled people is to be raised. More favorable conditions for participation in social labor are to be created for persons of retirement age who wish to work. The pension provision system is to be improved, including by raising minimum pensions and gradually closing the gap between the conditions and social security levels enjoyed by kolkhoz members, workers, and employees.

A package of measures to improve Soviet people's health is to be introduced. The quality of medical services is to be steadily enhanced, and the transition to a system of universal clinical check-ups for the population is to be achieved. Stronger measures are to be taken to protect the health of mothers and children. There is to be accelerated development of the network of health service institutions and of sanatoriums, rest homes, boarding houses, and tourism organizations, and the standard of service in them is to be raised.

A boost to the population's education and culture is to be ensured, and its spiritual requirements are to be more fully satisfied. The patriotic and international education of Soviet people, and of young people in particular, is to be stepped up. More active work is to be done to safeguard and augment the national cultural heritage and to preserve monuments of Soviet and world history and culture.

The creation of an integrated system of continuous education is to be ensured. The activity of general education schools and the vocational and technical education syustem is to be improved, and secondary specialized and higher education are to be developed. The quality of the training of specialists and the improvement of cadres' qualifications is to be raised, primarily in new specialized fields linked with scientific and technical progress.

The forms and organization of the leisure of all categories of the population are to be improved. The length of paid leave is to rise taking account of working people's increased labor contribution. Collective horticulture and market gardening are to develop widely.

The mass development of physical culture and sports is to be encouraged, and their introduction into daily life promoted everywhere.

Environmental protection work is to be persistently carried out, and thrifty use of natural resources is to be ensured.

Production is to be transferred onto a mainly intensive path of development and, on this basis, the pace of economic growth is to be accelerated. The country's national income is to almost double.

The growth of national income and of output from all sectors of material production is to result fully from increased labor productivity. Social labor productivity is to rise 130-150 percent, and a decisive step is to be taken in implementing the program task of achieving the highest world levels in terms of this indicator.

The policy of thrift, which is one of the most important factors for the intensification of production, is to be consistently stepped up. The saving of resources is be turned into a decisive source for the satisfaction of the national economy's growing needs. The aim is to ensure that 75-80 percent of the growth in needs for fuel, energy, and raw and other materials is satisfied through savings. The national income's energy consumption is to be reduced by a factor of no less than 1.4, and its metals consumption is be almost halved. Comprehensive use is to made of natural and material resources, and there is to be maximum elimination of losses and irrational expenditure. Secondary resources and by-products are to be introduced more widely into economic circulation.

The efficiency of capital investments is to be enhanced and they are to be concentrated in priority areas, primarily on the renewal of fixed production assets; there is to be a substantial increase in the proportion of funds channeled into the retooling and modernization of enterprises, and the time taken to recoup capital investments is to be reduced.

Better use is to be made of fixed production capital, a full workload for equipment and capacities is to be ensured, and a greater return on capital is to be sought.

The utmost acceleration of scientific and technical progress and ubiquitous application of its results in producitom, management, the services sphere, and everyday life are to be ensured.

The national economy is to reach leading positions in science and technology. More efficient use is to be made of the forms and methods for the implementation of scientific and technical progress inherent in socialism. The integration of science and production is to be intensified, and there is to be improvement in the organization of, and reduction in the time taken for, the elaboration of scientific discoveries and technical innovations and inventions and their assimilation in the national economy.

The quality of production and services is to rise to the level of the best Soviet and world achievements.

The dynamic and balanced development of the country's unified national economic complex and the efficient interaction of all its links are to be ensured. Progressive changes are to be implemented in the national economy's structure.

The sectors and production processes which determine scientific and technical progress and the soluiton of social tasks are to develop at a faster pace.

Production of industrial output is to at least double.

Heavy industry — the foundation of the country's economy and the base for supplying the national economy with the means of production — is to be steadily consolidated.

There is to be considerable acceleration in the development of machine building. The technical standard of output produced is to be fundamentally enhanced. The creation and assimilation of the produciton of new generations of equipment making it possible to enhance labor productivity severalfold, to improve labor conditions, and to substantially reduce material expenditure are to be ensured. The material, scientific, and technical base of machine building is to be consolidated.

The fuel and energy complex is to be developed and the USSR Energy Program implemented more efficiently. With a view to improving the country's fuel and energy balance, electricity generation at AES's is to increase by no less than a factor of 5-7, while gas extraction is to increase 60-80 percent. Wider use is to be made of nontraditional renewable energy resources and secondary energy resources.

The Comprehensive Program for the Chemicalization of the USSR Naitonal Economy is to be implemented. Profound qualitative changes are to be ensured in metallurgy and other sectors producing structural materials. There is to be expansion of the range and growth of the output of the most economical types of metal products and of essentially new chemical, construction, and other progressive materials.

There is to be consistent pursuit of the line, mapped out by the USSR Food Program, of fuller satisfaction of the country's needs for agricultural produce, further consolidation of agriculture's material and technical base, and social restructuring of the countryside. Accelerated and balanced development of the agro-industrial complex sectors is to be implemented, and the return on all types of resources allocated for these purposes is to be increased. The transfer of agriculture to an industrial base by way of comprehensive mechanization, chemicalization, electrification, land reclamation, and widespread introduction of intensive technologies is to be completed. Considerable growth is to be pursued in the harvest yields of all agricultural crops and in stockraising productivity; the stability of agricultural production is to be ensured; and the latter's dependence on natural and climatic conditions is to be reduced to a minimum.

The Comprehensive Program for the Development of Consumer Goods Production and the Services Sphere is to be implemented. The output of nonfood goods is to be increased no less than 80-90 percent, and the volume of services rendered to the population by a factor of 2.1-2.3.

Capital construction is to be raised to a qualitatively new level. Fundamental improvement in construction production, considerable enhancement of quality, and reduction of the cost of works are to be pursued; advanced methods are to be introduced more actively; the organization of construction is to be improved; and the efficiency of design work is to be enhanced. The time taken for the construction and reconstruction of projects is to be reduced by a factor of 1.5-2 over the next decade.

Transportation, electricity, gas, and oil supplies, communications, the material and technical supplies system, and other sectors of the production infrastructure are to be developed at an accelerated pace.

The harmonious economic and social development of all union republics is to be ensured. The distribution of production forces is to be improved. The comprehensive nature of the development and the specialization of the economies of republics and economic regions are to be stepped up, and their contribution to the consolidation of the country's unified national economic complex and to the solution of social tasks is to be increased.

Trading, economic, scientific, and technical ties, and cultural exchanges with foreign countries are to be developed on a mutually advantageous basis. Fuller use is to be made of the advantages of the international division of labor, and primarily with the countries of the socialist community.

There is to be further all-cound development of cooperation with CEMA countries and other socialist countries. Socialist economic integration is to be raised to a higher level; and specialization, production sharing, and new and efficient forms of cooperation are to be developed. Consistent implementation, jointly with the CEMA countries, of programs for the development of economic, scientific, and technical cooperation for the period through the year 2000 on bilateral and multilateral basis is to be envisaged.

Economic, scientific, and technical cooperation with developing countries is to be expanded. Economic ties with interested capitalist states are to be developed on a mutually advantageous and equal basis.

There is to be comprehensive improvement of management, and better use is to be made of the advantages and potential of the socialist planning system.

There is to be consistent implementation and development of the fundamental Leninist principles of socialist management, and primarily of democratic centralism. The central organs' efforts are to be concentrated on the solution of statewide, intersectorial, and interregional problems of social production.

The organizational structure of the management of sectors in the national economy of the USSR and the union republics is to be improved.

The scientific validity of plans is to increase. Fuller consideration is to be given to the Comprehensive Program for USSR Scientific and Technical Progress and the General Plan for the Deployment of USSR Production Forces when elaborating state plans.

The role of economic methods of management, economic autonomy, and economic responsibility of associations and enterprises is to be enhanced. Further development of financial autonomy is to be ensured, and the influence of financial-credit levers and the price system on production efficiency is to be stepped up. The ruble's stability is to be enhanced, and the circulation of money in the country is to be improved.

The role of soviets — the most important form of socialist people's power — in economic, social, and cultural building is to be stepped up. The working people's participation in management is to be expanded.

The implementation of the set tasks will make it possible to raise Soviet society to a higher level of economic and social progress, and the USSR will enter the third millenium as an even more powerful developed power and, by means of its achievements, will exert a constantly increasing progressive influence on the course of world development.

III. Basic Tasks for the Economic and Social Development of the USSR for 1986-1990

The 12th 5-Year Plan has a very important role to play in implementing the strategic tasks of the next 15 years. It is to be a turning point in all areas of the country's economic and social development.

The main task of the 12th 5-Year Plan is to increase the rate and efficiency of the economy's development on the basis of speeding up scientific and technical progress, retooling and modernizing production, intensive use of existing production potential, and improving the management system and the economic mechanism and on this basis achieve a further increase in the Soviet people's prosperity.

The 12th 5-Year Plan must at the same time resolve a wide range of tasks bound up with improving people's lives, achieving dynamic development in all national economic sectors, and maintaining the country's defense capability at an appropriate level.

Stemming from the main task of the 12th 5-Year Plan:

National income used for consumption and accumulation is to be increased by 19-22 percent. The entire increase is to be secured by raising labor productivity. The materials-intensiveness of the social product is to be reduced by 4-5 percent. The energy-intensiveness of national income is to be reduced by 7-9 percent and metals-intensiveness by 13-15 percent.

The output of industrial products is to be increased by 21-24 percent, including means of production (group "A") by 20-23 percent and consumer items (group "B") by 22-25 percent.

The processing sectors of industry are to be developed at preferential rates. The volume of output in these sectors is to be boosted by 25-28 percent, with an increase in the output of fuel and raw materials sectors of 11-13 percent. The country's growing fuel and energy requirements are to be met chiefly by ensuring economy of fuel and energy resources and accelerated development of nuclear energy, the gas industry, and coal extraction by the open-cut method.

The development of machine building is to be accelerated and its technical standard is to be improved. The planned program for the reconstruction and modernization of metallurgy is to be implemented. The rate of chemicalization and electrification of the national economy is to be increased.

The implementation of the USSR Food Program, the balanced development of the agro-industrial complex sectors, and a considerable increase in the efficiency with which allocated resources are used is to be secured.

Capital investments are to be channeled primarily toward the reconstruction and retooling of existing enterprises, and the proportion of capital investments for these purposes in production construction is to be increased to 50 percent. The course of further industrializing construction production is to be consistently pursued.

The production infrastructure sectors are to be comprehensively developed. There is to be an improvement in meeting the needs of the national economy and the population for transportation and other kinds of services.

A breakthrough in intensifying production is to be achieved on the basis of making extensive use of the achievements of science and technology, implementing progressive improvements [sdvigi] in the structure and organization of production, and increasing labor, technological, and state discipline.

The renewal of production equipment is to be speeded up primarily by faster replacement of low-efficiency equipment with progressive, highly productive equipment. A general inventory of fixed produciton capital is to be carried out. More than one-third of its assets [aktivnaya chast] is to be renewed. The volume of withdrawal of obsolete fixed production capital is to be at least doubled compared with the 11th 5-Year Plan.

Comprehensive programs for the retooling and reconstruction of production and its continuous renewal on the basis of modern equipment and advanced technology are to be drawn up and implemented in every sector and at associations and enterprises. The role played by production development funds in retooling associations and enterprises is to be enhanced by ensuring that these funds are channeled for these purposes as a priority.

Existing production, scientific, and technical potential is to be used more intensively. Smooth functioning of production and maximum equipment loading is to be sought, and use of equipment in shifts is to be considerably increased.

The utilization of labor resources is to be improved. Social labor productivity is to be raised by 20-23 percent, and by 23-25 percent in industry. The entire increase in the output of industry and agriculture and also in the volume of shipments by rail transport and in construction work is to be obtained by raising labor productivity. Preferential growth in labor productivity, as compared with the increase in labor payment, is to be secured.

Fundamental improvement in the quality of output and the services provided, as a very important factor in the intensification of the economy and in more fully meeting the growing needs of the national economy and the population, is to be considered a matter of paramount importance.

The thrift policy is to be stepped up. Rational and economical expenditure of all kinds of resources and reduced losses are to be persistently sought, and transition to resource-saving and waste-free technologies is to be carried out more quickly. The exploitation of secondary resources and production waste is to be considerably boosted, production capacities involved in reprocessing them are to be developed, the organization of the collection of secondary raw materials, including collection from the population, is to be improved, and the material and technical base of procurement organizations is to be consolidated. Energy and other resources are to be used thriftily in everyday life.

In 1990, as compared with 1985, the following are to be ensured:

In the national economy — savings in organic fuel of 200-230 million metric tons of standard fuel, including 75-90 million metric tons by developing atomic energy and utilizing renewable energy resources; savings in rolled ferrous metal of 12-14 million metric tons.

The prime cost of output and of works in industry is to be reduced by 4-5 percent, in construction by 2-3 percent, and in agriculture (sovkhozes) by 5-7 percent.

The turnover of national economic resources is to be speeded up; stocks of goods and materials must not be allowed to exceed the norm. Direct and long-term economic ties between suppliers and consumers and wholesale trade in materials and equipment are to be developed and improved.

A range of measures aimed at fully meeting the national economy's requirements for packaging materials is to be implemented, primarily through a preferential increase in the output of economical types of packaging materials, harmonization, standardization, and recycling.

More favorable conditions for highly efficient labor are to be created, sanitary and hygiene conditions and safety regulations are to be improved, and the standard [kultura] of production is to be raised. The scientific organization of labor and the collective contract are to be more vigorously introduced and working time is to be used more rationally. A unified statewide system of planning, accounting, certificating, and rationalizing work positions is to be set up. The use of manual and physically demanding labor, especially in loading, unloading, warehouse, and other ancillary work, must be consistently cut back.

Sectorial and territorial specialization, production sharing, and combined production are to be more extensively developed.

A package of measures to further increase the people's material and cultural standard of life is to be implemented. A growth in real per capital income of 13-15 percent is to be secured. The satisfaction of the population's requirements for goods and services is to be considerably improved by focusing on progressive changes in the pattern of growing effective demand.

The social infrastructure sectors are to be comprehensively developed. The scale of housing construction is to be increased, its quality is to be improved, and the provision of the urban and rural population with well-appointed housing and municipal and consumer services is to be boosted. The social restructuring of the countryside is to be speeded up.

Increasing every worker's contribution to the common cause of developing the national economy is an indispensable condition for implementing the planned social program.

IV. Acceleration of Scientific and Technical Progress and Development of Science

The resolution of the key political and economic task is to be ensured — scientific and technical progress is to be accelerated in every possible way. The role of science and technology in the qualitative transformation of productive forces, in shifting the economy to the path of comprehensive intensification, and in improving social production efficiency is to be resolutely enhanced. The orientation of scientific and technical development toward resolving social tasks is to be stepped up.

A cardinal improvement in the technical standard of production is to be achieved, above all by reorganizing investment and structural policy and concentrating resources in the most important avenues of scientific and technical progress — the development of electronics, nuclear power generation, comprehensive automation, and technology for the production and processing of new materials. At least two-thirds of the increase in social labor productivity during the 5-year period is to be secured as a result of utilizing scientific and technical achievements.

A package of measures is to be implemented to improve production technology. The use of progressive base technologies is to be expanded by 50-100 percent in the 12th 5-Year Plan. The broad introduction of fundamentally new technologies — electron beam, plasma, pulsed, biological, radiation, membrane, chemical, and other technologies which make it possible to increase labor productivity many times over, to improve the efficiency of resource utilization, and to reduce the energy- and materials-intensiveness of production — into the national economy is to be ensured. The transition is to be made to industrial, intensive techniques in plant growing and livestock raising, and extensive use is to be made of biological and genetic engineering methods.

The organizational and technological flexibility of production is to be consistently enhanced. Automated systems are to be introduced into various sphere of economic activity and primarily into planning and management of equipment and manufacturing processes. The level of production automation is to be approximately doubled. Comprehensive automated production facilities are to be created which can be quickly and economically reorganized.

The development and putting into production of new generations of highly efficient equipment is to be accelerated. The transition is to be made to the production of machine systems and technological equipment complexes. Updating of equipment in production must be considerably accelerated; in 1990 production of new machinery, equipment, and instruments is to constitute at least 13 percent of overall machine building output.

The mass production of personal computers is to be organized. Growth of 100-130 percent is to be ensured in the volume of production of computer equipment, and its reliability is to be improved. The scale of the use of modern, highly productive computers of all classes is to be increased at a high rate. The creation of collectively used computer centers, integrated data banks, and information processing and transmitting networks is to be continued, and the efficiency of their work is to be improved.

In the development of new equipment and technology, fuller use is to be made of the potential of materials with previously specified properties, particularly progressive structural materials, including synthetic, composition, ultrapure, and other materials, which produce a great saving in the national economy.

The proportion of industrial output in the top-quality category is to be increased 90-110 percent, the reliability and operating life of equipment are to be enhanced, and the introduction of comprehensive quality control systems is to be generally completed. The review of standards and specifications for output is to be accelerated, orienting them toward the highest world achievements. Metrological services for the national economy are to be improved. The standard of work on classifying industrial output is to be raised so as to ensure the objective assessment of output quality. The standardization of technologies is to be developed on the basis of promising scientific and technical achievements, and the sectorial and intersectorial standardization of machines, assemblies, and components is to be deepened.

Working people's scientific and technical creativity is to be encouraged. Invention and patenting and licensing work is to be improved. All the necessary conditions are to be created for the speediest introduction of inventions and rationalization proposals into the national economy. The state system of scientific and technical information is to be developed. The exchange of scientific and technical achievements is to be improved. The work of scientific and technical societies is to be stepped up.

The fundamental task is to strengthen ties between science and production and to create organizational forms for the integration of science, technology, and production, which make it possible to ensure the efficient and rapid passage of scientific ideas from conception to broad application in practice. The responsibility of scientific organizations for the standard of research and development and for its fullest utilization is to be increased.

The role and responsibility of the USSR State Committee for Science and Technology in determining the priority directions for scientific and technical progress, in solving major intersectorial scientific and technical problems, in organizing the development of fundamentally new equipment and technology, and in monitoring the scientific and technical level of sectors, the conformity of production to the best world achievements, and the formation of a network of scientific research and planning and design and technological organizations are to be enhanced.

The role of the USSR Academy of Sciences as the coordinator of scientific research work in the country is to be enhanced and its responsibility for creating the theoretical foundations for fundamentally new types of equipment and technology is to be increased. Priority significance is to be attached to the development of fundamental science, which predetermines the attainment of a qualitatively higher level by social production. The technical thrust of the work of academy institutes is to be strengthened. The role of sector and republic academies is to be enhanced.

The standards and effectiveness of sector science are to be substantially enhanced and its plant sector is to be strengthened. The network of science-and-production associations is to be enlarged, directing them toward the creation and broad introduction of new generations of equipment and technological complexes and the constant improvement of production equipment and technology. Sector scientific research, design, and technological organizations are to be incorporated in science-and-production and production associations and enterprises, with, as a rule, only the head organizations whose efforts are concentrated on conducting research of an all-sector nature remaining directly subordinate to ministries and departments. The role of design, technological, and other engineering services of enterprises in ensuring scientific and technical progress and in making timely use of scientific and technical achievements is to be enhanced.

Measures are to be taken to significantly improve the utilization of the scientific potential of the higher education system, the volume of scientific research and development being done is to be substantially expanded and a sharp increase in the national economic return on it is to be secured.

Extensive use is to be made of progressive new forms of organizing scientific activity which make it possible to resolve major intersectorial scientific and technical problems within reduced times. Intersectorial scientific and technical complexes and centers are to be set up for the development and large-scale introduction of fundamentally new types of equipment and technology. Cooperation among the academy, sector, and VUZ sectors of science is to be improved.

The economic mechanism in the scientific sphere is to be improved by ensuring that material incentives for scientific collectives and individual workers are linked to their actual contribution to the solution of scientific and technical problems.

The efforts of the social, natural, and technical sciences are to be concentrated on the most important strategic directions which ensure the acceleration of economic and social development.

In the sphere of the social sciences, study of problems in the planned and comprehensive improvement of socialism and ways and means of gradual progress toward communism is to be stepped up and the ideological and theoretical standards and practical significance of scientific research are to be enhanced. More profound study is to be made of the urgent problems of dialectical and historical materialism, scientific communism, and political economy; of questions on increasing the CPSU's leading role; and of the experience of the international communist, workers, and national liberation movement. The standard of theoretical research in the sphere of the socialist economy, planning, management, labor, finance, pricing, and statistics is to be enhanced. More profound study is to be made of the processes for the development of the political system, socialist democracy, statehood, and socialist self-management and of the further rapprochement of the USSR's nations and ethnic groups. Research into the socioeconomic problems of scientific and technical progress is to be widened. Study of the objective natural laws of the development and experience of the socialist community, of ways to step up the CEMA countries' economic integration, and of the processes for the deepening of the general crisis of capitalism and the intensification of the peoples' struggle for peace and social progress is to be continued. It is necessary to vigorously expose all forms of bourgeois and reformist ideology, revisionism, and dogmatism.

In the sphere of the natural and technical sciences, research whose results will make it possible to ensure profound qualitative changes in productive forces and the creation of fundamentally new types of output, equipment, and technology is to be expanded. Theoretical and applied mathematics, information science and cybernetics, elementary-particle, nuclear, and solid-state physics, micro- and quantum electronics and optics, and radiophysics are to be developed,as is research in the sphere of nuclear and thermonuclear power, the transforming and transmitting of electricity and the opening up of nontraditional energy sources. More extensive research is to be conducted into the problems of mechanics and questions on the theory of production automation. The scientific principles of catalysis, chemical technology, bioengineering, and the creation of new structural materials are to be elaborated. Physicochemical biology and the scientific principles for obtaining physiologically active substances for medicine and agricultural production are to be developed; problems of immunology and virology, genetics and selection, and methods and means of preventing, diagnosing, and treating the most widespread diseases are to be elaborated. Comprehensive research is to be conducted into the structure and evolution of the earth's crust, the biosphere, the world ocean, and the atmosphere, as well as into space and the universe.

Work on training and improving the qualifications of scientific and scientific teaching cadres is to be improved.

Measures are to be implemented to improve the material and technical backup for science. The experimental-production base of science is to be strengthened and at least one-half of the capital investments allocated to the construction of scientific projects are to be channeled into its development. The equipping of scientific organizations and higher educational establishments with modern instruments, equipment, means of automation, computers, materials, and preparations for conducting scientific research is to be substantially improved.

V. The Development of Heavy Industry

The main tasks of heavy industry are to supply the national economy with fuel and raw material resources, machines, equipment, and other modern production means, to boost output of high-quality goods for the population, and to increase the efficiency of the work of its sectors.

On the basis of the aforesaid tasks it is necessary to ensure:

A widespread switch to the production of high-efficiency output corresponding in terms of its technical and economic indicators to the best world models and competitive in foreign markets — the time taken to assimilate new equipment and technology must be reduced sharply;

The improvement of the structure of heavy industry, the improvement of intersectorial and intrasectorial proportions, the accelerated development of machine building, nuclear power, the gas, chemical, and petrochemical industries, production of progressive structural materials, and the expansion of specialization and production sharing;

The renovation of production, first and foremost on the basis of its retooling and reconstruction and increases in the level of mechanization and automation;

The substantial increase of the production of means for the mechanization and automation of material-handling, loading and unloading, and warehouse work with a view to considerably reducing the sphere of use of manual, unskilled, and heavy physical labor;

The use of by-products from the food and fish industry as well as food waste for feed purposes is to be extended. Every farm is to create the necessary base for storing feed and preparing it for feeding to the animals. Measures are to be implemented to reduce the expenditure of grain for feed purposes. The aim is to ensure that grain is used as livestock feed only in its processed form.

On the basis of the strengthening of the feed base and the utilization of the achievements of genetics, selection, and new biological methods for improving the quality of the herd, livestock and poulty productivity is to be increased substantially and a steady growth is to be ensured in the production of livestock raising products. Meat production is to be increased to 21 million metric tons (slaughter weight), that of milk to 106-110 million metric tons, and that of eggs to 80-82 billion by 1990.

The organization of the raising and fattening of livestock and poultry is to be improved, intrafarm and interfarm specialization is to be developed, and intensive methods and progressive flow techniques for the production of meat, milk, and other produce are to be introduced. Fuller use is to be made of the potential of natural feed land for the development of sheep raising and livestock raising for meat; the fattening of livestock on pasture land is to be expanded. The production of wool, furs, and hides is to be increased and their quality improved. The raising of horses, deer, fur-bearing animals, rabbits, and bees, pond fish farming, and silk farming are to be developed. Veterinary services for livestock raising are to be improved.

With a view to supplementing food resources, the development of the subsidiary farms of enterprises and organizations is to be promoted in every way. Assistance is to be given to the citizens' personal plots through the allocation of hayfields and pastures and the sale of feed, seed, fertilizers, and young livestock and poultry. The organization of purchases of surplus agricultural produce from the population is to be improved.

The implementation of the long-term land reclamation program is to continue. During the 5-year period, 3.3 million hectares of irrigated land and 3.6 million hectares of drained land are to be commissioned on the basis of state capital investments, amelioration work is to be carried out over an area of 8.3 million hectares, and the technical state of existing irrigation systems is to be improved over an area of 5.6 million hectares. Questions about the reclamation of land and its availability for agriculture are to be resolved on a comprehensive basis. The efficiency of utilization of irrigated and drained land is to be increased and it is to be ensured that the planned yield [proyektnaya urozhaynost] is obtained on this land. The technical standards and quality of water resources construction are to be improved. Measures to accelerate the transition to water-conserving irrigation techniques and the thrifty utilization of water resources and land are to be elaborated and implemented. The study of problems connected with the regional redistribution of water resources is to be deepened.

On the basis of the chemicalization of agriculture and the expansion of the application of organic fertilizers, systematic work is to be done to increase soil fertility. In 1990 agriculture is to be supplied with 30-32 million metric tons of mineral fertilizers, 440,000-480,000 metric tons of chemical plant-protection agents, and at least 100 million metric tons of liming materials, including 24 million metric tons of local liming materials. The utilization of organic fertilizers is to be increased to 1.5 billion metric tons in 1990. Peat, sapropel, and other local resources are to be used more effectively for this purpose. Storage and methods of application to the soil are to be improved and the efficiency of application of fertilizers and chemical plant-protection agents is to be increased.

The delivery to agriculture of chemical feed supplements and preservatives, growth stimulators and biological plant-protection agents, various types of coatings, polymer materials, and other types of chemical products is to be increased.

The retooling of agricultural production is to be carried out purposefully. Over the 5-year period, agriculture is to be supplied with 1.9 million tractors, 1.6 million trucks, 1.77 million tractor trailers, and agricultural machines and equipment worth a total of at least R43 billion, of which R17 billion worth will be for livestock raising and feed production. The provision of sets of economical, high-productivity machines and specialized transport and loading and unloading facilities to the sector is to be improved.

The technical servicing and utilization of the machine and tractor pool is to be improved considerably and the kolkhozes' and sovkhozes' repair base is to be strengthened. The reliability of the electrical supply to agricultural consumers is to be increased.

Labor productivity in the public sector of agriculture is to be increased by 21-23 percent.

In the food and meat and dairy sectors of industry, an 18-20 percent growth in the volume of output is to be ensured and the quality and nutritional value of food products is to be improved.

Measures are to be implemented to retool enterprises in these sectors on the basis of equipping them with flow lines and equipment ensuring the comprehensive processing of produce and raw materials.

In 1990 11.7-12.2 million metric tons of meat, 1.5-1.7 million metric tons of animal oils, 31-32 million metric tons of whole milk products, 1 million metric tons of cheese, 10-11 million metric tons of granulated sugar (from sugar beet), 3.7-4 million metric tons of vegetable oil, and 16-18 billion standard cans of fruit and vegetables are to be produced from state raw materials resources.

The output of meat and convenience meat products in packaged and wrapped form is to be increased, bringing them up to 40-45 percent of the total volume of sales. The utilization of milk for food purposes is to be improved by processing it more thoroughly and extending the range of whole milk products. The production of jams, preserves, jellies, and juices, mainly in small packs, is to be increased considerably. With a view to ensuring the consistent implementation of measures to step up the struggle against drunkenness and alcoholism, a proportion of enterprises in the liquor, vodka, winemaking, and spirit industry are to be switched over to the production of food products that are in demand among the population.

In the fish industry, the production of edible fish products is to be increased to 4.4-4.6 million metric tons in 1990 and that of canned fish to approximately 3 billion standard cans. The delivery of live, chilled fish, fish products in dressed form, cured fillets, and smoked and dried fish products is to be increased. The efficiency of utilization of fish factory ships is to be increased and scientific research work and the industrial exploitation of the biological resources of the high seas are to be accelerated. Fishing in maritime regions of the USSR is to be developed more actively. The organization of fish farming and fishing in inland waters is to be improved substantially, work to create pond fish farms is to be expanded, and their potential is to be utilized everywhere to supply the population with fresh and chilled fish. The production base of fish processing enterprises is to be strengthened and the renewal of the fishing fleet is to be accelerated. The delivery to the fish industry of modern technical means of finding, catching, and processing fish is to be increased.

In food sectors of industry, the range of output is to be expanded, the quality improved, and the production of packaged goods is to be increased. More rational processing of raw materials is to take place. The production of children's and dietetic products and products enriched with vitamins, protein, and other additives of high biological and food value is to be considerably expanded. The output of convenience foods — quick-frozen fruit and vegetables and prepared dishes not requiring culinary work — and a wide range of nonalcoholic drinks and concentrates is to be increased.

Labor productivity is to be increased by 14-16 percent in the food industry, 25-28 percent in the meat and dairy industry, and 10-12 percent in the fish industry. In these sectors the prime cost of output is to be reduced by 3-5 percent.

In the hulling and milling and mixed feed industry, the technical standard of enterprises is to be improved on the basis of the use of high-efficiency equipment and leading technology; in the 5-year period the production of top quality flour is to be increased by 80-100 percent.

The construction and commissioning of elevators and grain stores is to be accelerated. The construction of elevators and mixed feed enterprises is to be expanded on the basis of interdepartmental cooperation, first and foremost, in remote grain regions. The mechanization of labor-intensive processes is to be carried out at a more rapid rate through the expansion of loose, container, and bale shipments of flour and mixed feeds. The quality of mixed feeds is to be improved and the proportion of grain in these feeds is to be reduced by means of the use of suitable [polnotsennyy] supplements.

In the microbiological industry, output is to double during the 5-year plan. The production of feed protein and other biologically active substances is to be expanded considerably. The raw materials base of bioengineering is to be developed, partly through increasing the use of gas. The fuller satisfaction of agriculture's requirements for the products of microbiological synthesis is to be ensured. Scientific and technical achievements in the sphere of biological and genetic engineering are to be introduced more actively.

In forestry, the reproduction and utilization of timber resources are to be improved and the achievements of science, zonal farming systems, chemicalization, and production mechanization are to be introduced more widely. More intensive use is to be made of forest land and the volume of work on protective tree cultivation [zashchitnoye lesorazvedeniye] and on tree planting around pasture land in desert and semidesert regions is to be increased. The monitoring of the rational utilization of timber raw material resources and of the protection of forests against fires, pests, and diseases is to be increased. A permanent raw materials base for the pulp and paper industry is to be developed in the European Urals zone.

VII. The Development of Consumer Goods Production and the Services Sphere

One of the most important tasks of all sectors, republics, and regions of the country without exception is to increase their contribution to resolving the varied tasks associated with boosting Soviet people's prosperity and to consistently implement the Comprehensive Program for the Development of Consumer Goods Production and the Services Sphere in 1986-2000.

In the next 5-year period the production of nonfood goods is to be increased by at least 30 percent. The population's various needs for textiles, clothing, footwear, cultural, everyday and domestic goods (especially for leisure, tourism, and sport), and other goods in mass demand must be more fully satisfied. Their manufacture and sale in a range meeting the demand of different groups of the population must be ensured. The quality of goods must be substantially improved; their technical and aesthetic standard and reliability in use must be increased.

A complex of measures to expand the production and sale to the population of high-quality construction materials and garden, truck farming, and other tools is to be implemented.

The volume of paid services to the population is to be increased by 30-40 percent and their quality and standards of service are to be improved. Services to the population in rural areas are to be developed at a higher rate. The system for the study and forecasting of demands for goods and services is to be improved and changes in working people's demands must be promptly reacted to.

In light industry, by 1990 production of textiles is to be increased to 14-15 billion square meters, production of knitwear is to be increased to 2.2-2.3 billion items, and production of footwear is to be increased to 900 million pairs. Production of woolen fabrics with an improved finish is to be increased by 70 percent, production of silken fabrics with new textures [struktur] is to be doubled, and production of nonwoven household materials is to be increased by 130 percent. The development of production of high-quality accessories is to be substantially accelerated. The production of goods for children is to be developed at preferential rates. The design of textiles and the styling and cut of sewn goods are to be considerably improved and the range of clothing and footwear for young people and older people is to be expanded.

The mechanization of labor processes is to be more widely introduced; automated spinning, weaving, and knitting production units and rapidly readjustable flow lines for the production of mass types of high-quality, fashionable clothing and footwear are to be created.

The rational utilization of raw and other materials and textiles is to be ensured and the utilization of chemical fibers and yarns, colorfast dyes, and other chemical materials is to be expanded.

Labor productivity is to be increased by 24-26 percent and output prime cost is to be reduced by 3-4 percent.

The production of cultural, everyday, and domestic goods is to be increased by 30-50 percent. The contribution made by heavy industry and defense industry sectors to supplying the population with various high-quality industrial goods, especially consumer durables, is to be substantially increased.

The production of domestic appliances reducing labor expenditure in housework is to be developed at an accelerated pace. It is necessary to switch largely to the production of standardized domestic refrigerators and freezers, washing and sewing machines, and other modern electric domestic appliances. Production is to be increased as follows: radio receivers by 30-40 percent; color television sets by 60 percent; tape recorders by 30 percent; sewing machines by 60 percent; furniture by 30 percent; garden sheds by 100 percent; and household chemical goods by 40-60 percent. The production of mechanized means for use on personal plots and in collective orchards and truck gardens is to be expanded.

In the medical industry, output volume is to be increased by at least 40 percent. The production of highly effective medicines — above all, for the treatment of the most widespread diseases — is to be started up and the production of the most modern instruments and apparatus for the diagnosis of disease and for the treatment of the population is to be expanded.

Measures to further develop local industry and strengthen its technical base are to be implemented with regard to regional peculiarities. The volume of output is to be increased by 30-40 percent, chiefly by expanding the range of goods, including art and craft goods and local construction materials. The quality of goods is to be improved. Wider use is to be made of home-based forms of labor. The utilization of local types of raw materials and secondary resources is to be increased.

The services sphere is to be further developed and its efficiency is to be improved. The quality and standard of services to the population is to be fundamentally improved; the network of enterprises and institutions in the services sphere is to be expanded and the organization of their work is to be improved; and types of services are to be diversified in order to create the greatest possible convenience for working people in the use of services. The material and technical base of the sectors serving the population is to be strengthened, the supply of modern, highly productive equipment to enterprises in these sectors is to be improved, and the introduction of progressive industrial processes is to be accelerated.

It is necessary to rationally site the network of enterprises, organizations, and institutions in the services sphere, bringing them closer to people's places of work, study, and residence. Enterprises and organizations in all sectors, irrespective of their specialization, must be widely involved in providing all types of consumer and other services to the population.

The paid services provided to the population by enterprises and institutions in housing and municipal services, consumer services, passenger transportation, communications, and culture; by sanatorium and resort, health [ozdorovitelnyy], and sports organizations; and legal services and notarial offices are to be developed. State personal and property insurance for citizens is to be developed and the services offered by savings banks are to be expanded.

The population's needs for repair services and technical servicing for means of transport, radioelectronic apparatus, domestic machines and appliances, furniture, and other household items are to be fully met. The construction of cooperative garages and pay parking lots for citizens' vehicles is to be expanded.

The services of laundries, dry-cleaning enterprises, hairdressing salons, and other services are to be developed at a faster pace. By 1990 the volume of services for the repair and construction of housing and the building of other structures on the basis of orders from the population is to be at least trebled. Contract construction organizations are to be enlisted for these purposes. At least 1 million orchard and truck garden plots are to be allocated per year and the provision of paid services for ancillary construction on these plots is to be organized on the requisite scale.

The volume of services provided to the population by tourist and excursion institutions is to be increased, the quality of these services is to be improved, and their forms and types are to be expanded. New tourist complexes, hotels, bases, and campgrounds are to be constructed. The population's needs for tourist requisites and equipment are to be fully met. The provision of tourist and excursion organizations with means of transport is to be improved.

Progressive new types of cultural services are to be developed. The network of theaters, movie theaters, museums, circuses, concert halls, and children's music and art schools is to be expanded. The role of club institutions in organizing the population's leisure, especially in the countryside, is to be increased.

Services to the population by all types of transportation are to be improved. Demands regarding the comfort of transportation are to be more fully taken into account and standards of service are to be improved. By 1990, passenger traffic on general purpose transportation is to be increased by 12-14 percent.

The development of existing subways and the construction of new ones are to be continued; the construction of subway lines in Chelyabinsk, Omsk, Krasnoyarsk, Alma-Ata, and Riga is to be begun. Measures are to be implemented to improve the work of the bus, tram, trolleybus, and taxicab pools, to strengthen their repair facilities, and to improve the regularity and efficiency of passenger transportation, especially in rural areas. The role of local soviets of people's deputies in this matter is to be increased. Passenger traffic on city transport is to be increased by 20-25 percent.

Communications services and technical news media are to be developed at a faster pace. The volume of telephone communication services provided to the population is to be increased by 60-70 percent, the number of intercity pay phones is to be increased by 150-200 percent, and the level of automation in intercity telephone communications is to be increased to 70 percent.

The reception of two television programs is to be ensured practically everywhere by the end of the 5-year plan. The network of multiprogram radio broadcasting in rural areas is to be expanded. The delivery of newspapers to subscribers and to the retail network on their day of publication as a rule is to be organized and the communications enterprises' levels of technical equipment are to be increased to this end.

The rational and, from the population's viewpoint, most convenient siting of the trade network is to be ensured via the construction of large trade enterprises in combination with the development of a network of small stores for the sale of basic necessities situated directly in residential areas. The extent to which trade enterprises are supplied with means of labor mechanization, particularly for the packaging of goods, is to be increased. The work of wholesale organizations is to be fundamentally improved and their siting is to be rationalized with a view to ensuring the uninterrupted supply of goods to retail trade. Standards of trade services are to be improved and maximum convenience for the population is to be created. Progressive forms of trade are to be developed in every possible way — self-service and the sale of goods by catalog, by sample, and on the basis of advance orders with home delivery. The network of trade name [firmennyy] stores is to be considerably increased, including via their organization within the system of the producing sectors. Mail-order trade is to be developed at a faster pace.

Public catering is to be developed at preferential rates, the organization of the sector's work is to be improved, and its material and technical base is to be strengthened. Industrial techniques for producing output are to be introduced on the basis of production-sharing with food industry sectors and the creation of large intermediate product enterprises producing semifinished products and on the basis of the centralized supply of these products to public catering enterprises. The network of canteens in schools, colleges, and higher and secondary specialized educational establishments is to be increased. Working people's needs for public catering at their place of work are to be fully satisfied by the end of the 5-year plan. The specialized network of rapid-service enterprises is to be expanded. The quality of dishes is to be improved considerably.

Within the consumer cooperatives system, provision is to be made for further increasing goods resources; trade services and public catering in rural areas are to be improved. The production of goods is to be built up via the more active involvement in production of agricultural output purchased from the population and from kolkhozes, the comprehensive improvement of the organization of the processing and storage of agricultural output, and the fattening of livestock and poultry, the breeding and catching of fish in inland bodies of water, and the utilization of local sources of raw materials. The volume of the procurement of medicinal plants, honey, berries, nuts, fruits, vegetables, and mushrooms is to be considerably increased. The satisfaction of the rural population's demand for various goods and services is to be substantially improved. The network of stores selling agricultural products purchased at contract prices is to be expanded in cities and industrial centers. Kolkhoz trade is to be developed, the work of kolkhoz markets is to be improved, and the population is to be assisted in delivering and selling surplus agricultural produce. The role and responsibility of union and autonomous republic councils of ministers, local soviets of people's deputies, and party, trade union, and economic organs for the development of the production of goods and the services sphere for the population are to be increased.

The volume of communications services is to be increased 26-28 percent. The development and enhancement of the reliability of operation of the country's unified automated communications network is to be continued on the basis of the latest achievements of science and technology.

IX. Capital Construction

The main task of capital construction is the creation and accelerated renewal of the national economy's fixed capital intended to develop social production and to resolve social tasks, and the radical enhancement of the efficiency of construction production.

Over the 5-year period there is to be an 18-22 percent increase in capital investments in the national economy and a 16-17 percent increase in the volume of contract work.

The effectiveness of capital investments is to be increased and their reproductive and technological structure is to be improved. Material, financial, and manpower resources are to be concentrated primarily on the retooling and modernization of existing enterprises and the installation of projects which determine scientific and technical progress and the solution of social tasks.

As of the 12th 5-Year Plan, the construction and commissioning of projects within normative deadlines is to be ensured. There is to be a considerable reduction in the number of projects under construction simultaneously, and the volumes of the construction backlog and uncompleted construction are to be brought down to the normative level. Stocks of uninstalled equipment are to be substantially reduced. The construction of production establishments is to be begun only if the potential of existing enterprises is being fully used and if the areas in which it is proposed to undertake the construction are provided with manpower resources, and also in the opening up of new regions and in cases where it is necessary for the introduction of fundamentally new technologies. The cost of construction per unit of capacity commissioned is to be reduced. The quality of construction is to be improved substantially.

The comprehensive construction of production establishments is to be undertaken, and the prompt installation and commissioning of apartment blocks and sociocultural and consumer establishments stipulated in the drafts is to be ensured unconditionally.

The further industrialization of construction production is to be consistently carried out, transforming it into a single process for erecting projects from prefabricated elements. There is to be a transition to the supply to sites of engineering and manufacturing units in complete sets of enlarged units. The creation and introduction of progressive technology and systems of machinery and mechanisms ensuring the comprehensive mechanization of construction and installation work, especially under the conditions of the modernization of existing enterprises, are to be accelerated. Traditional labor-intensive processes are to be replaced by modern industrial methods in finishing work. The volume of work performed manually is to be reduced by approximately 25 percent. The production of specialized construction equipment at the construction ministries' enterprises is to be substantially increased.

The structure of the designs and construction materials used is to be improved and the use of efficient types of rolled metal, plastics, resins, polymers, and progressive articles made of timber and ceramic and other nonmetallic materials is to be expanded.

Savings of rolled ferrous metal products of the order of 14-16 percent, cement 10-12 percent, and timber 12-14 percent are to be ensured.

The organization of construction production is to be improved. The policy of amalgamating construction and installation organizations and pruning superfluous echelons of management is to be continued, the autonomy of construction and installation trusts is to be expanded, and their responsibility is to be enhanced for the timely commissioning of capacities and projects and the improvement of the results of economic activity. Progressive forms and methods of labor are to be introduced more widely, the team contract is to be developed, teams are to be amalgamated, and the organization of their work is to be improved. The mobility of construction organizations is to be enhanced so that they can more rapidly erect installations in unpopulated and remote regions.

The responsibility of planning and construction organizations for the scientific and technical standard of construction output is to be enhanced. Their interest in undertaking the retooling and reconstruction of existing enterprises is to be increased.

The improvement of planning and estimate work is to be continued. The quality of construction feasibility studies and planning documentation is to be raised, and the responsibility of planning organizations and consultant bodies is to be heightened. Plans should provide for the widespread application of progressive scientific and technical achievements, resource - and energy-saving technologies and equipment, economical modular-layout [obemno-planirovochnyye] solutions, structures, and materials, and advanced methods of production and labor organization, thus consistently reducing the expenditure of material, fuel and energy, and manpower resources per unit of output. On this basis, in the plans for the construction sites of the 12th 5-Year Plan there is to be an average reduction of 4-5 percent throughout the national economy in the specific indicators for the estimated cost of construction, including construction and installation work.

The quality of architectual and town planning decisions is to be improved. The specialization of planning and surveying organizations is to be developed and design supervision is to be stepped up. The system of automated planning is to be introduced more widely.

The responsibility of the USSR Gosstroy for the implementation of a unified technical policy in construction is to be increased.

Labor productivity in construction is to be increased by 16-17 percent.

X. Social Development and Raising the People's Standard of Living

A further increase in the people's well-being is to be ensured, as is the fuller satisfaction of Soviet people's growing material and spiritual requirements. The impact of social measures on the development of production and the growth of production efficiency is to be intensified.

The level of consumption is to be consistently increased and its structure improved, and the population's provision with food products and nonfood commodities is to be consistently improved. The volume of retail commodity turnover is to increase by 18-22 percent over the 5 years.

The average months wage of workers and employees is to be raised by 13-15 percent, or to R215-220. The effectiveness of the labor payment system is to be increased; there is to be a closer link between working people's remuneration and their labor contribution; elements of wage leveling are to be resolutely eliminated; the material and moral liability for shortcomings and omissions in work is to be intensified.

The correlation of wage rates for the sectors of the national economy, and also in terms of different categories of working people in the context of the complexity and conditions of the work being done, is to be improved. The social recognition and prestige of the engineer's labor are to be enhanced. The role and authority of foremen, designers, and technologists are to be boosted; and the material and moral incentives for their labor and for a creative attitude toward their work are to be strengthened.

An increase in the basic wage rates and position salaries of workers and employees is to be phased in the national economy's production sectors as the necessary conditions are created and the resources procured. The joint Comprehensive Program for CEMA Member Countries' Scientific and Technical Progress Through the Year 2000 is to be unswervingly implemented. There is to be more extensive sharing with the CEMA countries in the creation and introduction of advanced equipment, technology, and materials, taking account of collectively developed solutions. Associations and enterprises are to be more actively involved in this work, notably through the development of direct production ties with enterprises in fraternal countries and also through the creation of joint enterprises. Further improvement of the management of the national economy is to be implemented. The system of management and economic activity, which is designed to ensure organic unity and effective interaction between planning, economic levers and incentives, and the organizational structures of management, is to be comprehensively developed. This system is to be targeted on a decisive shift to the use of intensive factors of production development, on the acceleration of scientific-technical progress, and on the fullest satisfaction of social needs.

The exchange of leading experience in planning and economic activity with the CEMA countries is to be improved.

There is to be a growth in the role of the main production link — science-production and production associations and enterprises — with the organic unity of their rights and obligations being ensured. The economic independence of associations and enterprises and their opportunities in the technical reequipment and improvement of production and in planning are to be significantly expanded.

The economic responsibility of associations and enterprises for the end results of work, for the fulfillment of contractual commitments, and for the better utilization of all types of resources is to be increased. Transition to the integral planning of scientific and technical progress is to be achieved and the necessary measures are to be implemented to ensure that plan targets are based on the achievements of scientific-technical progress and that they secure the development of each sector on the base of extensive use of new equipment and technology.

Reciprocal links between long-term forecasting and forward and current planning are to be strengthened. Wider use is to be made of the automated system of plan accounting, and its coordination with sector and departmental automated control systems must be ensured.

Opportunities for consumer influence on the technical standards and quality of output are to be expanded, and long-term economic ties and wholesale trade are to be developed.

The effectiveness of economic levers and incentives is to be increased. The role of economic methods of management is to be intensified, and financial autonomy is to be strengthened in all links of production, the consumer sphere, and other types of services. Financially autonomous relations are to be built up increasingly on the basis of 5-year plan targets and economic normatives that are laid down, tying the amounts of resources left at associations' and enterprises' disposal to the results of their work. The stability of these normatives in the course of implementing the 5-year plan is to be ensured. Opportunities for associations and enterprises to use their own resources to give material incentives to members of the labor collective are to be expanded.

The role of economic levers in increasing production efficiency and maintaining the thrift regime, improving output quality, renewing fixed capital, speeding up the turnover of circulating capital, reducing prime cost, and increasing the profitability of production is to be substantially intensified. The structure of the union republics' national economic management is to be improved, taking into account their role and place in the unionwide division of labor.

Organs are to be set up to manage groups of interconnected sectors. The forms of intersector management are to be improved. The functions and structure of ministries and departments are to be clarified to take account of the introduction of new management methods and the expanded rights of associations and enterprises. Their efforts are to be concentrated on determining prospects for sectors' development, drawing up the major apportionments, and elaborating and implementing a unified scientific-technical and investment policy. Ministries' and departments' responsibility for the fulfillment of state plans, the comprehensive development of a sector to a modern technical standard, the effective resolution of production specialization and cooperation questions, and the satisfaction of the national economy's and the population's requirements in terms of the sector's output is to be increased. Measures are to be implemented to improve the work style and methods of ministries and departments.

Science-production and production associations are to be developed and their scientific-technical subdivisions reinforced. In cases where it is necessary, intersector associations are to be set up with the intention of accelerating the solution of scientific-technical and economic tasks. The optimum combination of large, medium, and small specialized enterprises is to be ensured.

The efficiency of management apparatus' work is to be increased, clearer distinctions as to rights and obligations are to be drawn between management organs, superfluous tiers are to be removed, duplication and parallelism in work are to be eliminated, and organization and technical backup for management work are to be improved.

Efforts are to be made to achieve the optimum numerical correlation between workers engaged in production and in management. The management apparatus is to be substantially simplified and cheapened, day-to-day questions are to be resolved on a more current basis, and central management organs are to be freed from having to examine petty and secondary questions. Formalism and bureaucracy in work are to be resolutely eliminated, and the number of instructions and directions issued is to be sharply reduced.

The activity of union and autonomous republic councils of ministers and local soviet ispolkoms is to be improved and they are to be given an increased role in ensuring comprehensive development of the economy on the territory under their jurisdiction, rational use of labor, raw materials, and fuel and energy resources, production sharing, environmental protection, and increasing economic efficiency. Local budget revenues are to be made more dependent on the results of the economic activity of associations, enterprises, and organizations located on the territory in question. The joint utilization of enterprises' budget resources and facilities for expanding the social and production infrastructure is to be expanded. Effective monitoring of the allocation of the housing stock is to be ensured.

The system for training economic leader and specialist cadres, particularly in the higher and middle tiers, is to be improved, taking account of the new demands. Cadres are to be trained who possess not only modern scientific, technical, and economic knowledge, but also broad horizons, organizational capabilities, and the ability to resolve tasks first and foremost from the viewpoint of statewide interests. Selection, placement, and retraining of leading workers and specialists is to be improved.

The Basic Guidelines for the USSR's Economic and Social Development for 1986-1990 and the Period Through the Year 2000 constitute a document of tremendous political importance. They lay down the major positions that need to be achieved to secure a qualitatively new level of prosperity for Soviet people and a further strengthening of our motherland's economic and defense might.

The scale of the work outlined by the CPSU for accelerating the country's economic and social development is imposing. Implementing the basic guidelines will demand great efforts by the party, the working class, the kolkhoz peasantry, and the people's intelligentsia and must become a partywide, statewide cause.

The main task now consists of achieving a breakthrough in work in accordance with the 27th CPSU Congress decisions and effecting a turn in all spheres of economic activity, achieving higher peaks with less expenditure, and making maximum use of everything the country has at its disposal — the powerful economic and scientific-technical potential that has been created and all the existing reserves and opportunities. To ensure the achievement of high results, to manage skillfully on the basis of the organic combination of accumulated experience with new knowledge and new decisions — these are the essence of today's demands on labor collectives, on party, soviet, and economic organs, and on all social organizations at the center and local level. Every association and the enterprise, shop, and production section are to determine which links can secure the greatest results with minimum extra expenditure.

Above all, the main reserve, the essentially inexhaustible reserve which is made up of the human factor, people, and the guarantee of a high standard of organization, discipline, and order, is to be brought fully into action.

A great responsibility for implementing the plans outlined lies with the Communists, with the party organizations, which are obligated to head the masses' political and labor enthusiasm and to do everything to support their initiative and their creative enterprise. The union republic communist party central committees, the party kraykoms, obkoms, okruzhkoms, gorkoms, and raykoms, and the primary party organizations are to initiate extensive political and organizational work to these ends, strive for efficient use of existing reserves and for the strictest thrift regime, introduce the Leninist style of economic activity everywhere, and be more active in performing educational work so that every working person and every labor collective works creatively and at full productivity. It is important to be persistent in instilling the businesslike approach in cadres, to restructure people's economic thinking and psychological mood toward working in the new way, and to increase responsibility for the work allotted to them.

It is necessary for the soviets to make fuller use of their rights in the sphere of economic and sociocultural building. The trade unions are to extend socialist competition even wider, increase competition publicity, struggle more persistently to fulfill and overfulfill plan targets, improve production and daily living conditions for working people, improve working people's professional and general cultural standards, disseminate leading experience more widely, and help increase the labor collectives' role in resolving production and social questions. The Lenin Komsomol is required to direct the enthusiasm and the ebullient energy of the young to the implementation of the tasks set.

People's control and financial and law enforcement organs are to be a reliable bar to every kind of violation of state discipline, to mismanagement, and to any encroachments on obtaining [posyagatelstvan na polucheniye] unearned incomes.

The Basic Guidelines for the USSR's economic and social development are a concrete program of action for the working people and all Soviet people. They are the party's directive on strengthening the country's economic might and resolving major, urgent scientific-technical and economic tasks in the interests of further boosting the people's prosperity and securing our society's comprehensive development.

The implementation of the outlined tasks will have not only internal, but also great international significance, will serve the deepening of socialist economic integration and the further assertion of the principle of peaceful coexistence among states with different social systems, will increase the magnetic force of the ideas of socialism even more, and will constitute a weighty contribution to the cause of reinforcing world peace.

The 27th CPSU Congress expresses firm confidence that the aims which the party is setting for the 12th 5-Year Plan and the period through 2000 will be achieved. As a result, the creative strength of socialism will be revealed even more fully and our Soviet motherland will become richer and mightier. The guarantee of this is Soviet people's creative labor and the inviolable unity of party and people.

TOWER RESIGNATION FROM GENEVA DELEGATION NOTED

LD121551 Moscow TASS International Service in Russian 1049 GMT 12 Mar 86

[Text] Washington, 12 Mar (TASS) -- John Tower, member of the U.S. delegation at the Soviet-American talks on nuclear and space weapons in Geneva and head of the group on strategic weapons, has resigned. The White House has announced that President Reagan will accept Tower's resignation, and that it had not been caused by "political disagreements."

According to the newspaper THE WASHINGTON POST, Tower, a well-know "hawk" and former senator, had been aiming to become U.S. Secretary of Defense. He regarded his post in Geneva as a "launching pad" on his way to the Pentagon. Underlying Tower's decision, the newspaper notes, "is a realization of the fact that Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger has no intention of leaving his post." Ronald Lehman, special assistant to the president for national security, is supposed to succeed him. He, the newspaper writes, referring to opinion in Washington official circles, will secure the succession in this post.

U.S. CONTINUES OPPOSING ARMS CONTROL MEASURES

PM121015 Moscow KRASNAYA ZVEZDA in Russian 8 Mar 86 Single Edition p 3

[Colonel M. Ponomarev "Military-Political Review": "At a Historic Turning Point"]

[Text] We live in a troubled and contradictory world. It is characterized on the one hand by the increasing interdependence of countries and peoples, and on the other by confrontation among different social forces and by conflicts of very great intensity. A sober and profound assessment of the situation that has arisen in the international arena leads to the unambiguous conclusion that mankind is at a turning point in its history.

This conclusion was drawn at the 27th CPSU Congress -- in the party Central Committee's Political Report to the congress and in the documents adopted by the Soviet Communists' top party forum. This conclusion is based on a creative Marxist-Leninist analysis and on a reiterpretation of all factors of modern world development. The congress gave exhaustive replies to the most burning questions of our time. The congress emphasized very strongly that the complexity and acuteness of the historical moment render still more urgent the task of outlawing nuclear weapons, totally eliminating them and other weapons of mass destruction, and improving international relations. At the same time, reducing the time taken to seek political accords and going over as quickly as possible to constructive actions is a pressing condition for success in solving urgent questions of international life.

Moscow points the way to improve international relations and to eliminate the terrible danger hanging over mankind. The world public and the governments of many countries have perceived the concept of mutual and universal security and a nuclear-free world, advanced by the CPSU Central Committee general secretary in his 15 January statement, as an event of truly epoch-making significance. All the world's peoples equally desire and cherish the goals set in the statement. The world held its breath as it read and heard the Soviet Union's historically significant proposals for the total elimination of nuclear weapons before the end of this century and the prevention of militarization of space, and their further development and concretization at the 27th CPSU Congress.

But what of the U.S. Administration? How has official Washington reacted to the large-scale Soviet peace initiatives?

Before answering these questions of vital significance to all mankind, it would not be out of place to cite the words of U.S. Secretary of State G. Shultz: "Our countries proceed from irreconcilably different views of the world." There is no getting away from the fact that this is so. The world of capital and, above all, the right wing of the U. S. monopoly bourgeoisie have not abandoned the ideology and policy of hegemonism. They continue to entertain illusory hopes of social revenge and of strong-arm superiority. The U.S. ruling circles still regard fueling international tension as a way of justifying increased military appropriations, global pretensions, and interference in other countries' affairs. In short, because of its social nature, imperialism constantly generates an aggressive, adventurist policy.

Proceeding from their aggressive policy, in recent years imperialist states have stepped up militarist preparations still further. The tone is set in this matter by the United States, which has become the citadel of international reaction and militarism. It is intensively deploying ground-, air-, and sea-based strategic offensive forces and developing weapons based on new physical principles. The number of U.S. medium-range missiles in Europe is increasing. The United States is reorganizing its Armed Forces with a view to considerably increasing their combat potential. Parts of the world thousands of miles distant from the United States are declared zones of its "national interests." Washington's plans to implement the so-called "Strategic Defense Initiative," which provides for the deployment of strike weapons in space, represent a special danger. On the other side of the ocean supremacy in space is regarded as a means that can ensure supremacy on earth. Thus, the U.S. "star wars" program is a program for the peoples' renewed enslavement and subjection to imperialist diktat.

The chief purpose of Washington's actions in implementing SDI and further escalating the nuclear arms race is to achieve decisive military superiority over the USSR and to be able to threaten it with a nuclear first strike. All this is leading to the creation of a real threat of war being unleashed against the Soviet Union and other socialist states.

The U.S. President's reply to the 15 January Soviet statement should also be viewed in the light of these facts. R. Reagan's reply voices agreement in general, as it were, with particular Soviet theses or intentions with regard to questions of disarmament and security. But the President's positive statements with regard to the Soviet initiatives really drown in various kinds of provisos, "linkages," and "conditions," which in fact block the solution of fundamental questions of disarmament. The reduction of strategic nuclear arsenals is made conditional on the USSR's consent to the "star wars" program and reductions -- unilateral reductions, moreover -- in Soviet conventional weapons. And problems of regional conflicts and also of bilateral relations are tied to this. The elimination of nuclear weapons in Europe is blocked by references to the stance of Britain and France and by demands for Soviet defenses in the east of the country to be weakened while U.S. military strength in that region is maintained. The refusal to end nuclear tests is justified by arguments to the effect that nuclear weapons serve as a "deterrent" factor. In short, the White House chief's reply shows no sign of any serious readiness to really begin solving cardinal problems in removing the nuclear threat.

What is more, in recent days, when world attention has been riveted on the work of the 27th CPSU Congress in Moscow, speeches by President Reagan and other Washington administration representatives have once again openly and cynically voiced the intention to continue the former militarist course. Appearing on national television recently, the White House head praised to the skies the results of the administration's implementation of the long-term program to "modernize America's military strength," He particularly credited himself with creating a new generation of nuclear missile arms: MX ICBM's, the Trident nuclear first-strike submarine missile system, the B-1B and Stealth strategic bombers, and so forth. At the same time, the President tried to portray the matter as though the unrestrained buildup of U.S. military might were necessary for... the success of the talks with the Soviet Union. "Strength," he declared, "is the most convincing argument we have with which to persuade opponents to negotiate seriously."

In his television address the President tried his best to publicize his "new" proposal for medium-range missiles in Europe, which is nothing but a rehash of the notorious "zero option." He once again campaigned for the militarization of space and essentially made acceptance of the "star wars" program a condition for solving the question of reducing strategic arms. At the same time, he made it clear that Washington has not the slightest intention of confining itself to so-called research in the SDI sphere; it is already planning to create [sozdaniye] real space weapons systems without delay.

The U.S. President's radio address, which followed his television address, was also couched in the same spirit. It, too, pursued the aim of preventing a reduction in military spending, which would threaten the profits of the military-industrial complex. Declaring that the United States has made great strides in creating the sound foundations of a powerful and realiable military machine, the President asserted that this work has not yet been completed. "We cannot afford," he said, "to let what we have achieved over the past 5 years to be undermined by incautious budget cuts."

The White House is stubbornly trying to ensure that the military budget for the next fiscal year exceeds this year's budget by almost 12 percent. It is a question of allocating $311.6 billion to the Pentagon. It is planned to increase appropriations for the "star wars" program by 75 percent at once and to raise them to almost $5 billion. Even many congressmen have been shocked by the U.S. militarist circles' excessive appetites. Thus, Senator J. Abdnor declared: "The White House budget planners have lost all sense of reality by proposing huge increases in military spending."

However, this is not the only area in which the Washington administration lacks a sense of reality. With both his speeches the head of the White House tried to justify, imposing on the country a new round of the arms race and continuing the unconstructive and futile strong-arm approach to relations with the Soviet Union. The essence and purport of the course proposed by Washington is to achieve decisive military superiority over the USSR and to be able to threaten to inflict a nuclear first strike.

Top Pentagon officials at once came out in support of the stand taken by the President. Pentagon chief C. Weinberger, for example, publicly claims that "the world has become a safer place" as a result of the implementation of the program for "rearming America" and constantly increasing military spending. Admiral W. Crowe, chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, categorically declared that the United States should not stop nuclear tests on 31 March 1986, that is, the date to which the USSR has extended its unilaterally adopted moratorium on all nuclear explosions. Crowe was not ashamed to admit openly that the United States needs to carry out nuclear explosions on a permanent basis to ensure the "reliability and stability" of U.S. arms.

This, up to now, is Washington's reply to the Soviet peace initiatives. However, the powers that be across the ocean ought to fully comprehend the conclusion drawn in the CPSU Central Committee Political Report to the 27th party congress: "The military strength, in which the United States puts its trust in order to preserve the status quo, protect the interests of monopolies and the military-industrial complex, and prevent further progressive transformations in liberated countries, can only complicate the situation and give rise to new conflicts."

The policy of total opposition and confrontation, which the U.S. Administration is still trying to pursue, has no future. Soviet policy, which enjoys the ever-increasing support of the world's peoples, organically combines the indefatigable struggle for peace with readiness to deal a firm rebuff to any aggression. In the military sphere the USSR intends to continue to act in such a way that no one need have any grounds for fears, even imagined fears, for his safety. But the Soviet Union and its allies equally want to be rid of a sense of impending threat. As was declared from the high rostrum of the 27th CPSU Congress, the Soviet Union does not lay claim to greater security. It will not agree to less security. Ever!

SIX NATIONS CALL FOR TOTAL NUCLEAR TEST BAN

Coincides With USSR Stance

LD112159 Moscow Domestic Service in Russian 1724 GMT 11 Mar 86

[From the "International Diary" program presented by Sergey Pravdin]

[Text] News agencies are summarizing a new statement by the leaders of six countries--Argentina, Greece, India, Mexico, Tanzania, and Sweden -- which includes an appeal to the United States and the USSR to carry out no nuclear tests before the next Soviet-American summit meeting, planned for this year. As REUTER news agency notes, the text of the statement by the authors of the well-known Delhi Declaration was agreed and adopted during the life of the late Swedish Prime Minister Olof Palme, who was villainously murdered at the end of last month. To comment on this act by eminent statesmen and politicians of six states of Europe, Latin America, Asia, and Africa, I shall ask my colleague, Igor Surguchev:

Their appeal is addressed to both Moscow and Washington, but in essence it is an urgent appeal to the U.S. Administration to join, before it is too late, the unilateral Soviet moratorium on all nuclear explosions, which runs out in 20 days. The world clearly understands the exceptional importance and value of our country's initiative in introducing the moratorium, which opens up realistic prospects for progress toward curbing the nuclear arms race and ultimately ridding mankind of the threat of thermonuclear catastrophe. It is for just this reason that public and political circles of various countries are demanding ever more insistently that the White House should not miss a favorable moment, but should follow the Soviet Union's example.

And now, once again, six states on four continents are raising their voices on behalf of hundreds of millions of people in support of the idea of stopping nuclear tests. There is no doubt that their present concrete proposal is constructive in character and can be put into practice if the United States agrees to halt nuclear explosions. So it is not the USSR that is holding things up.

However, as Soviet leaders have often stressed, our country cannot go on forever extending its unilateral moratorium. The Reagan administration must at last understand that the question of halting nuclear tests affects not only the United States and the Soviet Union; it concerns the vital interests of all peoples, of all mankind.

And the authors of the Delhi Declaration, in their appeal, are once again reminding the White House of this.

In conclusion, I would like to note that the realization of the proposal put forward by them would agree entirely both with the Soviet-American accords in Geneva and with our country's approach to the holding of the next meeting between the leaders of the USSR and the United States. This approach is that the meeting must be marked by real, tangible results in the field of curbing the arms race and disarmament. A bilateral moratorium on nuclear tests would in itself be a significant achievement and a good prerequisite for the conclusion of an international agreement on the total prohibition of such tests.

U.S. Rejects Appeal

[Text] Washington March 12 TASS -- TASS correspondent Yuriy Shvets reports:

The U.S. Administration has again turned down the possibility of a moratorium on nuclear testing and reiterated its intention to continue nuclear explosions for military purposes. Asked by TASS to comment on the proposal of six nonaligned countries to this effect, a spokesman for the Department of State said that the U.S. position of principle on nuclear testing remained unchanged and that nuclear weapons would remain the key element of the policy of "deterrence" in the foreseeable future. Nuclear testing will therefore continue to be essential, he said.

The leaders of Argentina, Greece, India, Mexico, Sweden and Tanzania sent letters to Mikhail Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, and U.S. President Ronald Reagan, suggesting that the USSR and the USA refrain from nuclear tests till the next Soviet-American summit and offered assistance in organizing reliable verification of compliance with such a moratorium. The reply of the U.S. Administration, which flatly rejected that major international initiative without going to the trouble of seriously examining it, shows that Washington is opposed in principle to the elimination of nuclear weapons. The U.S. stand also illustrates the hyprocrisy of the White House, which calls for ridding mankind of the threat of nuclear war while carrying on strenuous preparations for such a war.

To justify its destructive course, the administration has been holding forth at length on the need for effective verification of compliance with a moratorium so that it would be possible to introduce it. Saying that verification was unreliable, the USA refused to follow the example of the Soviet Union, which introduced a unilateral moratorium on nuclear explosions. The Soviet Union has stated on more than one occasion that it is prepared to work out dependable verification measures if an agreement on the moratorium is achieved. To contribute towards accord between the USSR and the USA in that area, the leaders of the six nonaligned countries offered in their letters their assistance in organizing dependable verification that would guarantee strict compliance with a moratorium on nuclear testing.

Such control would also include on-site inspections, held by the USA to be the main problem in the matter of arms control. The categorical rejection of that initiative in addition to others testifies to the outright hypocrisy of the White House.

The cause of this obstructionist line is clear: The USA views nuclear testing as an essential basic element of the modernization of its strategic forces, of the development of new weapons of mass destruction and the establishment of a partially space-based ABM system under its "star wars" program.

U.S. Public Supports Ban

[Report by own correspondent V. Gan: "For an End to Nuclear Explosions; American Public Demands"]

[Text] Washington, 11 Mar -- A group of U.S. legislators has held a press conference on Capitol Hill in support of the appeal to the USSR and the United States to refrain from nuclear tests issued by the leaders of Argentina, Greece, India, Mexico, Sweden, and Tanzania. In this statements, Senators Harkin and Simon and Representatives Bedell, Downey, and Leach pointed out that a mutual nuclear moratorium would be an important step in strengthening confidence between the two countries and would contribute to talks on concluding a treaty on the complete and comprehensive prohibition of nuclear explosions.

In Senator Harkin's opinion, the Soviet-U.S. summit meeting in Geneva last November provided hope for peace by stating that nuclear war must never be unleashed and can have no winners. However, words alone cannot halt the nuclear arms race, just as promises cannot prevent nuclear war. Therefore I support the appeal to introduce a moratorium until the next Soviet-U.S. summit talks, the senator declared.

The press conference participants emphasized the extreme urgency of taking concrete steps to curb the arms race in the interests of all mankind. As long as nuclear arms exist, there cannot be security in the world -- these words from the appeal by the six countries' leaders were the leitmotiv of the senators' and congressmen's statements.

It may be said without exaggeration that the legislators' opinion is supported by millions of Americans, who have mounted a national campaign to force the Reagan administration to subscribe to the USSR's unilateral moratorium. The Committee of American Friends in the Service of Society -- a Quaker organization -- is currently collecting signatures for a statement which reads, in part: "We believe that the Soviet moratorium on nuclear tests is an important step to achieving the goal of ending the nuclear arms race. We call on President Reagan to make an appropriate reply to it by immediately stopping all U.S. nuclear tests." This statement was approved at a joint conference of 25 U.S. antiwar organizations, which plan to send it to the White House.

In other words, people are demanding that official Washington confirm in practical deeds its eloquent talk about wanting peace and the elimination of nuclear arms. The administration, however, prefers to ignore these calls. THE WASHINGTON POST reports today that a new series of underground nuclear tests is expected to begin soon at the test range in Nevada.

SDI CHIEF SAYS REAL WEAPONS SOON TO BE PRODUCED

PM111420 Moscow IZVESTIYA in Russian 8 Mar 86 Morning Edition p 4

[Report by own correspondent L. Koryavin: "General Clutching at 'Star Sword'."]

[Text] Washington -- The United States is expediting production of space weapons. A statement by Lieutenant General O. Abrahamson is proof of this.

He is head of the organization for the implementation of the so-called "Strategic Defense Initiative," or, more accurately, the program to create extensive arsenals of space weapons within the framework of preparations for "star wars." The general was speaking at congressional hearings in order to "substantiate" the need for the United States to implement the strategic plans to militarize space.

J. Abrahamson resorted to disinformation in order to justify the "star wars" program behind a smokescreen. His speech was stereotyped and similar to many speeches by U.S. politicians and military figures. To start with, there was loud talk of the imaginary "Soviet threat" and "Soviet superiority," which has allegedly been achieved in the military plans relating to space.

Gen Abrahamson's "thesis" that the program of preparations for "star wars" is allegedly being implemented "in total accordance with the obligations assumed by the United States under treaties and international agreements" was also false. The general pressed for increased appropriations for space weapons production and bluntly stressed that if funds are obtained in the new 1987 fiscal year the SDI organization "intends to move from developing [razrabotka] technology to holding important practical experiments," which in ordinary language means the mass production of "star wars" weapons, in particular the so-called "space plane" and laser weapons.

SCIENTIST CONTINUES ASSESSMENT OF SDI WEAKNESSES

LD071147 Moscow in English to North America 2300 GMT 6 Mar 86

["Second part" of a "Soviet technical assessment" of the U.S. SDI program by Dr Boris Rauschenbach, member of the USSR Academy of Sciences and specialist in complex automatic systems, with questions in English by science correspondent Belitskiy; Rauschenbach's answers read in English by unidentified announcer -- recorded; from the "Science and Engineering" program]

[Text] [Belitskiy] Dr Rauschenbach, the antiballistic missile systems forming the core of SDI are to be extremely sophisticated automatic systems. Don't you feel that once they're deployed in outer space the situation there will be changed and will not this create new problems, such as humanity never faced before?

[Rauschenbach] I would say in this context that this is an extremely important factor that exerts a strong, if not crucial, influence on the situation in space. Up to now, in discussing all these matters, it's been understood that the parties to a potential conflict would take certain decisions on the strength of their assessment of the situation. These decisions would be taken by human beings. But the deployment of an ABM system in space would not change all these cardinally. There wouldn't be more than a 100 to 300 seconds at the disposal of an anti-missile battlestation from the moment it first detects a target to the moment it uses this or that weapon against it. Its instruments won't have the time to notify either the Pentagon or the President of what's happening. It will have to operate autonomously, independently, in the automatic mode.

[Belitskiy] In other words it will no longer be human beings that take the decisions, not even the military men, let alone political leaders. Decisions will have been entrusted to automatic systems.

[Rauschenbach] Yes, and automatic systems are bound to make mistakes. What this means is that the fate of the world will depend on the performance, on the proper adjustment, of this or that electronic circuit. And such circuits are incredibly complex. They're simply packed with active and passive components; any one of which can malfunction any second.

And no amount of redundant systems, nor any other ingenious strategies of enhancing reliability, can guarantee 100 percent fail-safe operation throughout the equipment's service life. And remember, a battlestation has to remain in orbit for long years, even decades, always on the alert for a launch of enemy missiles. This means that the probability of a system's malfunction will keep rising. The recent Challenger tragedy, which came as a deep shock to everyone connected with space research, demonstrated that even the most advanced systems are not immune to technical failure.

[Belitskiy] I believe that Challenger was a system of extremely high reliability. Some of its assemblies were not just duplicated but five fold redundancy was built in to them.

[Rauschenbach] Yes, in their space shuttles the Americans even dispensed with the automatic crew rescue systems, such as we have say in the Soyuz space craft, which provide for crew survival in the event of an accident during any state of the launch or flight. Yet this carefully designed and tested system turned out to be far less than 100 percent reliable. At the same time Challenger is a childishly simple system compared with those envisaged in SDI.

[Belitskiy] It's even hard to imagine what would happen should a explosion occur in one of the battlestations in space. The ABM system would surely react to this as the launching of an enemy attack and would activate appropriate weapons systems. That would immediately evoke countermeasures and so on.

[Belitskiy] Things like that have as a matter of fact already happened. There have been cases of American early warning stations mistaking a flock of geese for Soviet nuclear-capable bombers out to attack the United States.

[Rauschenbach] But in those cases, remember, there was invariably enough time to correct the mistake. A missile however is not a bomber. It doesn't leave humans a second for assessing the situation. What's more, in command on both sides is a star wars situation are not thinking people but inhuman computers programmed to wage war. All sorts of computers, computers on board battle stations in space, in missiles, warplanes, submarines, and surface vessels and huge ground-based computer complexes which concentrate and process data. Then, too, there are all sorts of homing devices.

[Belitskiy] What you are saying seems to suggest that this saturation of terrestrial space with all kinds of technology including military technology actually creates a new situation, new conditions for the functioning of automatic systems.

[Rauschenbach] I feel that peaceful satellites are only a small factor in turning terrestrial space into one big system. I am using the term system here as meaning a gigantic entity of diverse automatic devices which are in a complex interrelationship, exchange data, take decisions, and issue and execute commands. Big systems are of course a familiar things in modern technology, but here they operate in entirely different conditions.

It simply would never occur to anyone to deliberately deceive telephone exchanges and make them ring the wrong number. The very idea sounds crazy. Similarly, no sane person would ever dream of ways of interfering with the operation of an automatic system controlling say a rolling mill. But that is precisely what's in store for ABM systems. And another point, in industry such big systems are carefully debugged and tuned. This is a long and painstaking process; it dovetails their various assemblies, arranging something like mutual understanding and mutual assistance between them. But how can you possibly tune the big system it's proposed to deploy in space if the plans of preparation for star wars materialize? It's absurd to think that one side will conduct trial launchings of its missiles so that the other side can tune its battlestations to shoot them. Just as it's ridiculous to think that one side will show a potential opponent all the phases of the operation of its battlestations to make sure the stations can be knocked out by the other side's mines.

[Belitskiy] Let me sum up what you've said. What we are talking about is therefore a system that is to operate in the face of deliberate interference. It's also a system that can in principle never be debugged or tuned in its real environment. In short, the SDI system can never be tested.

[Rauschenbach] Yes, this is obvious even to the layman. A test would mean war. This being so the probability of war breaking out not for political reasons but simply because of errors in automatic systems greatly increases. You'd have the science fiction situation of man's survival being threatened by automatic devices of his own creation.

[Belitskiy] By the way, the American sci-fi writer Issac Asimov has said that technology is not to be trusted. If the SDI system is created the ultimate result of a single error on its part can be the extinction of the human race.

[Rauschenbach] This is in fact being realized by more and more scientists and political leaders. They also realize that SDI would upset the entire process of the normalization of Soviet-American relations, a process that seems to have been initiated. Fruitful Soviet-American talks in Geneva on ending the arms race are possible only if that race is not carried into outer space. Besides that, the very idea if nuclear disarmament would suffer, and the Americans continue to pay lip service to it. They keep claiming that SDI is intended to remove the nuclear threat. There is a far more rational way of achieving that, the only rational way to do away with nuclear weapons. That is what the Soviet leadership proposes and if the United States were to respond to this, humanity would enter the 21st century confident of its future.

CPSU SECURITY POLICY COMBATS 'NUCLEAR MADNESS'

PM121500 Moscow KRASNAYA ZVEZDA in Russian 11 Mar 86 Second Edition p 3

[Article by Colonel V. Yeshchenko, candidate of philosophical sciences, under the rubric "Policy of Peace Versus Policy of War": "The Alternative to Nuclear Madness"]

[Text] The Archimedes' lever of revolutionary upheaval in the history of international relations -- that is how the world public has rated the CPSU's foreign policy strategy as set out in the new edition of the CPSU Program and in the CPSU Central Committee Political Report to the 27th party congress. Having set itself the task of completely eliminating weapons of mass destruction before the end of the century, the Soviet Union gives the world community the sought-after "point of support, which offers mankind a fundamentally new area of development and the opportunity to concentrate on creation alone.

The attainment of this humanitarian goal is of vital interest to all the peoples of the world, which in its history has experienced thousands of wars, more than 100 of which have taken place in the second half of this century alone. At present the fires of more than 40 armed conflicts and wars are raging in the world. Each day they take thousands of human lives.

But the most awesome danger for the world's population is presented by the threat of nuclear war, which is capable of eliminating the human race from the face of the earth. There is no task more important or urgent now than halting the material preparation for such a war and halting the arms race. There is no more noble or uniting aim than saving mankind from the nuclear trap. For that reason, the 27th CPSU Congress stressed, the main thrust of the party's activity in the world arena for the future will continue to be the struggle against the nuclear danger and the arms race and for preserving and strengthening universal peace.

Analyzing the character and scale of the nuclear threat, our party formulated at the Central Committee April (1985) plenum and the 27th CPSU Congress the credo of political realism in the nuclear and space age. Its main tenets are as follows:

First, the character of modern weapons offers no state the hope of defending itself by military-technical means alone. No defense, whether with ground-based or space-based elements, "extensive" or "regional," or using even the most "exotic" technologies, guarantees anyone invulnerability in the event of nuclear conflict. Nor can real security be ensured by the doctrines of "containment" or "deterrence," which effectively transform the whole world into nuclear hostages.

On this basis, our party believes that it is necessary to radically revise the methodological approach to the solution of security problems and shift the stress from the military-technical sphere to the political sphere. Ensuring security requires the bold and resolute choice of political methods as the main and decisive means of preventing global nuclear conflict. The only acceptable basis of the concept of ensuring universal security now is not the buildup of the nuclear arsenals but their verifiable phased reduction, the limitation of the extent of "nuclear geography," and the complete elimination of the nuclear infrastructure and weapons of mass destruction.

Second, the CPSU has reached the conclusion that a new quality of security must be taken into account when dealing with the main question of the present day -- preventing nuclear war and ensuring reliable peace.

In relations between the USSR and the United States security can only be mutual, and in international relations only universal. That is also being said by sober-minded politicians in the West. "No matter what efforts the superpowers make, either in the military or technical sphere," Hoopes, former U.S. Air Force deputy secretary and chairman of the National Security Council believes, "none of those powers will be able to substantially alter the current balance of forces. The fact is that we will either coexist with the Russians or perish together with them. We have a common security problem."

Recognition of the need for mutual and universal security as a real fact of our times would help the United States and its NATO allies to renounce the concept of "mutual assured destruction" and promote their more active participation in the search for ways to build Soviet-U.S. relations in particular and international relations in general in accordance with the concept of "universal assured survival," as the Soviet Union urges.

Third, the 27th CPSU Congress documents contain an objective assessment of the causes of the war danger in the modern era. The United States and its military-industrial complex continue to be the engine of militarism. Reactionary militarist circles in the United States try to justify the arms race without going beyond their usual range of anticommunist doctrines and prejudices on the pretext, as Secretary of State Shultz said, that the "Soviet Union continues to pose a threat to the interests and ideals of the United States and the free world." In actual fact, this is a matter of U.S. imperialism's imperial ambitions and its desire for social revenge.

Fourth, political realism is inseparable from a sober assessment of the processes of world development and from the ability to see things without prejudice or blinders (anti-Soviet, anti-U.S., and so forth). The times urgently demand an end to the simplified view of a world, in the process of rapid change, as an "arena of struggle between good and evil," embodied in the first instance in the form of "America, chosen by God" and in the second as the "godless empire of the USSR." The moving force of social changes in the world is the class struggle for social progress and national liberation.

In a civilized world it is impermissible to wield the "big military fist," albeit disguised, according to Pentagon chief Weinberger, in the "kid gloves of diplomacy," or to "punish" entire peoples for "disobedience." Nowadays, in the nuclear age, the ethics of international communications demand the strict observance of all sovereign states' legitimate interests. Everyone, particularly the nuclear powers, must know how to behave with restraint and circumspection and live in a civilized manner.

In this connection the 27th CPSU Congress paid great attention to the problem of the psychological restructuring of international relations. Its essence consists in moving from bellicosity, which has built up over the centuries, and from modes of thought and action based on the acceptability and permissiblity of wars and armed conflicts, to peaceful coexistence among states with different social systems. The objective historical preconditions for that have come about. That is why for the Soviet Union peaceful coexistence is not a short-term policy of convenience, but the basis of a foreign policy strategy. Soviet military doctrine is also formed in full accordance with the spirit and letter of this strategy. Its defensive character gives no one grounds to fear for their security, even imaginary fear.

At the same time, it is common knowledge that scenarios exist in the West for a nuclear attack on the USSR and the Warsaw Pact countries. The United States has a Single Integrated Operation Plan (SIOP-6) for conducting combat operations during a "large-scale" strategic war, which envisages nuclear strikes being delivered against 40,000 targets in the socialist and developing countries.

NATO has formulated a corresponding "duplicate" of that plan, the so-called regional "plan of combat operations using nuclear weapons" (NOP), which envisages the nuclear bombing of between 18 and 25 targets (mainly economic and industrial) in the European part of the USSR and on the territory of other Warsaw Pact countries.

When putting forward its nuclear disarmament program, the CPSU proceeds from the premise that it is now impossible to win the arms race and that the striving for military superiority cannot bring political advantages to any side. The USSR lays no claims to greater security, but neither will it accept diminished security. The military-political situation which has taken to fulfill their containing role.

The military-strategic equilibrium existing between the USSR and the United States and the Warsaw Pact and NATO represents an equal danger to the opposing sides. According to U.S. NEWS AND WORLD REPORT, the United States "for the next 100 years has 10 times more warheads than it needs to be sure of destroying that society" (the USSR). But the Soviet Union also has all it needs to firmly rebuff any aggressor. Consequently, the continuation of the nuclear arms race and, even more, its extension to space, loses its practical purpose. Reliance on "over armament" can only increase the equal danger to the point where even parity cases to be a factor of military-political containment.

However, in the West and above all in the United States, militarist circles continue stubbornly aiming at the attainment of military superiority over the USSR. And contrary to common sense they even assert that the more nuclear weapons there are, the better it is for peace and the more effectively they help to "prevent" a third world war. Such distorted logic can only be called the very essence of nuclear madness. Nevertheless, the Pentagon's documents sent to Congress along with the fiscal 1987 budget say: "The restoration of America's military might represents a new definition of the conditions of Soviet-U.S. relations. The United States is now beginning to act from a position of strength. In fact, it is the only way of holding effective talks."

The star wars program that is being implemented by the Pentagon represents a particular danger in this context. Washington makes no secret of the fact that a basic aim of this program is to seize the strategic commanding heights. Dominance in space makes it possible to secure dominance on earth. The star wars program is a strategy for the enslavement of the peoples and their subordination to imperialist diktat.

The Soviet Union warns that transferring the arms race to space will accelerate the already critically high pace of the stockpiling and improvement of nuclear and other types of weapons and will be an insuperable obstacle on the path to radical disarmament. From the rostrum of the 27th party congress a stern warning was issued to the space adventurists with their illusory schemes, and at the same time a readiness was expressed to do everything to prevent the militarization of space.

The CPSU's foreign policy course of destroying the means of mass extermination and of averting the war danger, a course formulated at the 27th party congress, is a convincing alternative to nuclear madness. It inspires the confidence that no matter how great the threat to peace created by the policy of imperialism's aggressive circles, there is no fatal inevitability of world war. But it is necessary to struggle to ensure firm peace and freedom, to achieve success in the fight against war, a success which will be a historic victory for all mankind and every person on our planet.

UN RIGHTS PANEL ADOPTS RESOLUTION OF MERCENARIES

[Text] Geneva March 11 TASS -- TASS correspondent Vladislav Shishlo reports:

The United Nations Commission on Human Rights working here has adopted a number of resolutions, specifically, the resolution "The Use of Mercenaries as a Means of Opposing the Exercise of People's Right to Self-Determination", the resolution "On The State of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide" and the resolution "Human Rights and the Scientific and Technical Progress".

The resolution on the use of mercenaries expresses profound concern over the mounting threat that the activity of mercenaries poses to all states of the world and recognises the fact that mercenarism threatens international peace and security and, just as genocide, is a crime against humanity.

The resolution urges all states to show the utmost vigilance in the face of the menace represented by the activity of mercenaries, to employ administrative and legislative measures to prevent the use of their territories and other territories under their control for the passage of mercenaries or for the planning of actions aimed at the destabilisation or overthrow of the government of any state and the struggle against national liberation movements, and prevent the use of their citizens for recruiting, financing and training mercenaries and forming their units.

Another resolution, "On the State of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide" which was submitted by the Belorussian Soviet Socialist Republic and the Polish People's Republic, points again to the fact that genocide is a crime and contradicts the spirit and goals of the United Nations Organisation. The resolution confirms this need for international cooperation to rid humanity of this abominable phenomenon.

The resolution "Human Rights and Scientific and Technical Progress" which has been submitted by the delegations of Angola, Afghanistan, the Belorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, USSR and others confirms the resolve of peoples of the United Nations to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, to maintain international peace and security, to develop friendly relations among nations and international cooperation, to promote respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms.

The United Nations Commission on Human Rights emphasises again the imperative need for taking urgent measures toward general and complete disarmament, particularly nuclear disarmament, for the sake of life on earth.

The resolution also says that no question is now of greater importance for every people on earth than safeguarding peace and ensuring man's primary right, the right to live. The resolution urges all peoples to join in the United Nations efforts to safeguard peace and future of humanity.

These resolutions have been adopted by the overwhelming majority of members of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights.

MONGOLIA'S BATMONH, ETHIOPIA'S MENGISTU INTERVIEW

LD022250 Moscow Television Service in Russian 2058 GMT 1 Mar 86

[Interview with Jambyn Batmonh, chairman of the People's Great Hural Presidium of the Mongolian People's Republic, and Mengistu Haile Mariam, chairman of the Provisional Military Administrative Council of Ethiopia, by Farid Seyful-Mulyukov and an unidentified announcer at the Kremlin Palace of Congresses during the 27th CPSU Congress; Batmonh speaks in Russian, Mengistu in Amharic followed by translation into Russian by interpreter; Batmonh, Mengistu shown speaking separately -- recorded]

[Excerpt] [Interviewer] Comrade Batmonh, at our congress we are solving the question of accelerating of our country's socioeconomic development. How is that question being solved in your country?

[Batmonh] Acceleration of economic and social development is characteristic of all socialist countries. We are preparing for our next, 19th party congress. Today is the 65th anniversary of our party's formation.

[Interviewer] Congratulations.

[Batmonh] Yes. Our congress takes place at the end of May. We will review the results of the past 5-year plan and will define the main tasks for 1986-1990.

[Seyful-Mulyukov] What, in your opinion, will be the 27th CPSU Congress' significance for strengthening socialism's position throughout the world?

[Batmonh] Huge significance, because the world socialist community is now the main factor of contemporary development. Is the Soviet Union, is the main bulwark in the socialist community, its economic and scientific-technical potential [words indistinct]. The 27th congress defines the development of the Soviet Union's economic and scientific-technical potential for the period up to the year 2000. Here special attention is being given to the question of developing and strengthening cooperation with the fraternal socialist countries.

[Seyful-Mulyukov] What is your opinion of the work of the congress?

[Mengistu] It is very important for us, representatives of progressive countries; it is a teaching congress. We have seen how concrete tasks should be set and how realistic ways of performing them should be worked out. This applies to both domestic and foreign policy questions.

[Seyful-Mulyukov] Problems of the so-called Third World -- apartheid, cruel neocolonialist exploitation, and imperialist subversion against young states were discussed.

[Mengistu] Imperialism currently is trying to subordinate young developing states to its domination, to prevent the spread of Marxist-Leninist ideology among them, to halt and, if possible, turn back the revolutionary process in those countries.

For these aims international imperialism, especially of the United States, uses military presence, interference in the internal affairs of those countries, economic sanctions and blockades, and, naturally, international terrorism, although that is far from a complete list of all the means to which reactionary forces have recourse to prevent our progressive development.

[Seyful-Mulyukov] How is your country doing today?

[Mengistu] We have been on the road to democratic reforms for 12 years now. The foundation of the Ethiopian Workers Party was one of our most substantial victories. We have given land over to the peasants; we have given the people equal rights; public organizations have been formed in the most various fields. This has given the broad popular masses an opportunity to participate in all of our initiatives. However, we are only half-way there. The fight goes on. I would like to convey cordial thanks from all our people to the Soviet people. The Soviet Union has constantly given us moral, economic, and political support since the beginning of our revolution. I would like to wish the Soviet people success in fulfilling all decisions and programs. The Soviet Union's prosperity and progress is essentially prosperity and progress for the entire democratic world.

AFANASYEV DOUBTS GORBACHEV WILL VISIT U.S. IN JUNE

OW130239 Tokyo KYODO in English 0229 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow, March 13 KYODO -- A senior Communist Party member predicted that Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev is unlikely to visit Washington in June for another summit with U.S. President Ronald Reagan.

The date for Gorbachev's U.S. visit has yet to be fixed, said Viktor G. Afanasyev, chief editor of the party newspaper PRAVDA in an interview with KYODO NEWS SERVICE Wednesday. "My personal view is that it would be difficult (for Gorbachev) to go to Washington in June," he said.

June has been cited by many as the likeliest timing for a Gorbachev visit to the U.S. The leaders of the two superpowers held their first summit in Geneva last November and agreed to meet again this year.

Afanasyev, a member of the Soviet Communist Party Central Committee, is often regarded by Western Journalists as a spokesman for the Kremlin on international relations.

In the interview, he criticized the U.S. Government, saying that Washington has been promoting its star wars project and other military expansion programs while all the time proposing measures to prevent a nuclear war. The unfriendly attitude of the U.S. toward the Soviet Union has not changed, the PRAVDA editor said.

Afanasyev also said the recent move by the U.S. demanding a 40 percent cut in the staff of the Soviet representative office at the United Nations would affect plans for another U.S.-Soviet summit, though he did not elaborate. The Soviet official said the Soviet Union has not put any preconditions on the summit.

On relations with Japan, Afanasyev said that the January visit to Tokyo by Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze had brought a favorable turnabout in Russo-Japanese relations. As to the timing for a Gorbachev visit to Japan promised in a joint communique at the end of Shevardnadze's visit, he said: "The date has not fixed. It is a matter to be decided by the leader himself."

Afanasyev was asked about a statement by Japanese Prime Minister Yasuhiro Nakasone that he would be ready to visit Moscow before Gorbachev came to Japan if this promised results which would please the Japanese people -- an allusion to progress in the territorial dispute between the two countries involving four northern islands off Japan's Hokkaido.

"We would be glad if a peace treaty were concluded between the two countries," Afanasyev said, and added, "But I don't really understand what would please the Japanese." The Soviet Union will not make any concession on the territorial problem, he said. The territorial issue over the islands, held by the Soviet Union since the end of World War II, stands in the way of a peace treaty between the two countries. The Soviet Union declared war on Japan in the closing weeks of World War II.

Afanasyev also dismissed the idea that the Soviet Union might return the two smaller islands of the four -- Habomai and Shikotan -- as a compromise in accordance with a Japan-Soviet joint communique made in 1956. "In my view, it's impossible," said Afanasyev, because Japan gave up Sakhalin and the Kuril Islands under the post-war San Francisco peace treaty, to which, however, the Soviet Union was not a party.

FURTHER CRITICISM OF U.S. DECISION ON UN

Weinberger Remarks Assailed

LD102235 Moscow TASS International Service in Russian 2145 GMT 10 Mar 86

["Washington Against the United Nations" -- TASS headline]

[Text] Moscow, 11 Mar (TASS) -- TASS political observer Yuriy Kornilov writes:

In an interview for ABC, U.S. Defense Secretary Weinberger stated that even if the UN commission of expert jurists should deem the U.S. State Department's demand that the number of diplomatic personnel of permanent USSR, Ukrainian SSR, and Belorussian SSR missions to the United Nations should be cut by 40 percent to be against the law, incompatible with the norms of international law, and U.S. international obligations, the administration will act as it sees fit and will not alter its decision.

Impudence? An open challenge to the international public? Yes, undoubtedly. However, to see Mr Weinberger's statement only in this light is tantamount to leaving things unsaid. This statement yet again confirms Washington's irrepressible imperial ambitions, constituting yet another evidence of the fact that U.S. ruling circles in the grip of hegemonsitic intoxication, intend to continue to crudely trample underfoot the universally accepted norms of international law, U.S. international obligations, and the UN Charter itself, to which the U.S. appended its signature.

And this is how, as a matter of fact, it actually happens. It is sufficient to be convinced of this to peruse UN decisions and resolutions. Whatever important contemporary issue the community of nations has examined, whether the problem of curbing the arms race, the matter of eliminating the vestiges of colonialism or, say, the problem of establishing just economic relations, the U.S. delegation practically always acts counter to the will of the overwhelming majority of community members and tries to torpedo decisions from being adopted. Let us recall in this connection, for example, that at the General Assembly jubilee session Washington said: "No!" 28 times in voting on resolutions regarding a cessation of the nuclear arms race and the spread of nuclear arms to space.

Such is the U.S. line at the United Nations. Such is its line in practical politics. A course of further whipping up the arms race, cynical interference in the internal affairs of sovereign states, attempts to stifle revolutionary and liberation movements using sanctions, blockades, and interventions, staking on threats, dictate and blackmail -- these are the instruments of Washington's imperial strategy.

Lies and fabrications intended to disguise Washington's aggressive plans and hegemonist pretensions are an integral feature of this policy. Such fabrications have been set in motion in this case, but they cannot conceal the true facts; specifically that it is precisely Washington that has attempted and is attempting to turn the United Nations into a type of "lever" for its own policies, into a nest of espionage against sovereign states. It is appropriate to recall in this connection the report of the U.S. newspaper NEWSDAY, which in an article entitled "The UN: A Vein of Gold for U.S. Intelligence" reveals how the U.S. National Security Agency, the FBI, and other U.S. special services operate at the United Nations, intercepting other countries' diplomatic cables and illegally searching the residences of foreign diplomats. And can it be reagarded as a coincidence that the United States is now represented at the United Nations by none other than General Vernon Walters, who used to be one of the "chiefs" of the CIA and of the U.S. military intelligence service (RUMO).

It is characteristic that Washington's illegal demand for a cut in the diplomatic staff of the permanent missions of the USSR, Ukrainian SSR, and Belorussian SSR is especially zealously justified and defended by none other than the chief of the Pentagon, that headquarters for the "war hawks."

It is the Pentagon, which is most closely connected with the U.S. military-industrial giants in California and elsewhere that earn multibillion dollar profits from accelerated material preparations for war, that acts as the generator of militarism in the United States, the instigator and devotee of "strong-arm methods," and it is the U.S. military that especially does not like the line of curbing the arms race imperialist interference in others' affairs which is adhered to by the overwhelming majority of UN member states. Weinberger's statement is another piece of evidence showing the Pentagon's destructive role in the formulation of Washington's foreign policy.

The British newspaper DAILY MAIL termed Washington's current tactic "risky and irresponsible," noting that "one cannot play in this way with a process aimed at asserting peace." What is true is true. And there is a natural question within this question: Isn't it worth heeding those politicians and diplomats and press organs talking and writing in such terms, that for the sake of stopping Washington's dangerous and provocative games it is expedient to transfer the UN headquarters to another country, one whose government respects international law and legality?

Action 'Outrageous, Unlawful'

[Text] New York March 12 TASS -- The permanent mission of the USSR at the United Nations has sent a note to the permanent mission of the USA at the United Nations, stating a resolute protest against the unlawful demand of the U.S. Government for a reduction in the staff of the permanent mission of the USSR at the United Nations in New York. This action of the USA, the note says, is arbitrary and unjustified and constitutes a gross violation by the United States of its commitment of the host country of the U.N. central institutions to provide adequate conditions for the normal functioning of the organization and for the unhindered participation of the member countries in the work of the United Nations. The missions of the Ukraine and Belorussia also sent notes of similar contents to the U.S. mission.

Washington's outrageous unlawful action continues to be commented in the community of nations. The permanent representation of Iran to the United Nations stated that it considered the action taken by the USA a violation of the headquarters agreement. It is the prerogative of the U.N. member countries themselves to decide the question of the strength of their staff. The U.S. action is at odds with the spirit of the charter of the international organization. Our mission also comes against problems through the fault of the American authorities, an Iranian spokesman said. The USA often refuses visas, which prevents Iranian delegates even from attending sessions of the U.N. General Assembly. We have more than once protested against such actions of the U.S. Government, the spokesman said.

Commenting on Washington's hostile demarche, T. Frank, law professor at New York University and the author of books on U.N. history, has said that the headquarters agreement gives substantial reason to believe that what the United States is doing is unlawful. THE NEW YORK TIMES notes that a number of American experts are critical of the arbitrary decision of the USA, which they say can only do damage to international relations.

We believe that the demarche of the administration is outrageous and unlawful, TASS has been told by S. Johnson, a member of the leadership of the public organization Women Strike for Peace. The U.S. action shows anew thatthe U.S. Administration has no interest in the improvement of Soviet-American relations or in promoting cooperation and trust between the two countries. It is regrettable that this step has been taken at a time when realistic opportunities have been created for the improvement of the political climate both in relations between the USA and the USSR and on the international scene as a whole.

Moves Against UN To Continue

LD130827 Moscow TASS in English 0817 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] Washington March 13 TASS -- The U.S. Administration is planning to continue its moves against the United Nations and its specialised agencies. The evidence of that are the statements which were made at the hearings, held jointly by two subcommittees of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives by Assistant U.S. Secretary of State Alan Keyes and U.S. permanent representative at the United Nations retired General Vernon Walters. They asserted once again that administrative reforms and a change in the decision-taking procedure are obviously necessary in activities of the most competent international organisation. Alan Keyes did not conceal that it is through financial blackmail of the United Nations and its specialized agencies that Washington intends to seek the reforms that would suit the U.S.A.

U.S. expenditures on activities of U.N. agencies are planned to be cut by another scores of millions dollars in the 1986 fiscal year budget, drawn up by the White House, he said.

BOROVIK VIEWS REAGAN SPEECH, UN DECISION

LD120708 Moscow Television Service in Russian 1800 GMT 11 Mar 86

[Remarks by writer Genrikh Borovik: "The Threat to Fear"; from the "Vremya" newscast]

[Text] Hello, comrades. People are so tired of verbal speculation that I do not want to lower myself to polemics with it. This is probably why the U.S. President's speech, which was heard during our party congress, did not attract any particular attention; the majority of newspapers responded to it only with rejoinders. I too have no inclination to fill in the polemical gap. I will merely cite a few arguments from this speech, whose aim was twofold: to force through new increases in the U.S. military budget and to reply to our country's peaceful program.

I will dismiss at once the figures the President used in trying to convince his fellow citizens that the Soviet Union long ago overtook the United States in military terms. Even former President Carter, indignant at the speech that he heard, admitted with bitter irony that if the U.S. President really wants to justify the arms race, he will be supplied with any convenient figures. Here are some examples of the level of the argument. In trying to prove the necessity of increasing military orders, the President said arms must be bought from military companies in large quantities and not in small ones. It is more advantageous that way. The old traders' proverb has turned out to be correct, he said: It is cheaper by the dozen. In trying to justify the arms race, Reagan had no qualms about citing, in our nuclear age, the proverb: If you want peace, prepare for war, ascribing its authorship for some reason to George Washington, unaware, evidently, that it was born in the age of bows and arrows.

Even when it was uttered in Latin by the ancients, it was already considered to be sufficiently cynical. He also said that the arms race is the U.S. trump card, a powerful United States is like a world heavyweight boxing champion -- nobody can insult him.

I think that quite a few people in the world who listened to the speech asked themselves the disturbing question: Can the opinions of boxing commentators, the rules of market trade, and the military postulates oflegionaires in ancient Rome be transferred to the very complex outlines of international relations in the nuclear age? It is not just awkward to compare this view of the world to the peaceful program proposed to humanity by the Soviet side and by the ideas of our congress: they are so fundamentally opposed they should not even by mentioned together. Although Washington's arguments sound like a self-parody, they are not said in jest and reflect a serious process currently taking place in the United States.

Everyone knows the words of U.S. President Franklin Roosevelt about the United States needing to fear only one thing, fear itself. Notwithstanding this warning, it is precisely the fear of the Soviet threat that has always been the justification for the arms race. Now, after the Geneva meeting and after the announcement of our program of peace, it is not the threat of fear which has arisen, but a threat to fear [voznikla ugroza ne strakha, a ugroza strakhu]. Immediately those circles in the United States for whom the threat to fear is a threat to their well-being have become rabidly flustered. This is why, in the President's speech, Russians are mentioned as bogeymen 30 times. This is why once again the report on our country's mythical violations of the SALT-2 treaty has once again surfaced in Washington, although this issue was thoroughly clarified ages ago. This is why the State Department is adopting the illegitimate decision to cut back staff numbers at the UN Soviet delegation by 100 people. This decision is aimed not only against our country, but against the very idea of peace, dialogue, and contact which lies at the base of the United Nations. This is why the wave of spy-mania is being raised in the United States to such a level that the senator for New York state, is appealing for Soviet people not to be allowed on beaches, for it is from beaches, as he maintains, that it is particularly convenient for the Russians, using electronic apparatus, to listen to one U.S. telephone conversations. From the beach!

The anti-Soviet commotion in Washington has not been evoked by fear in the face of a Soviet military threat, but by fear of our peaceful proposals, our peaceful capacity for initiative [initsiativnost] in search of ways to detente. This search is finding a response throughout the world, in the United States itself, and even in its Congress. Fear in the face of the threat to fear -- a ridiculous paradox. Scared people, however, are not just ridiculous, they're also dangerous, first of all for the United States itself. The great President Franklin Roosevelt was right when he warned about this.

FURTHER REACTION TO U.S. ANTI-NICARAGUAN EFFORTS

Kosysh Commentary

LD121859 Moscow Television Service in Russian 1530 GMT 12 Mar 86

[Vitaliy Kobysh commentary; from the "Vremya" newscast]

[Text] Hello, comrades! A mortal threat has been hanging over the United States. At any time it could be subjected to armed aggression which would be terrifying in its consequences. What is it? The Soviet military threat again? The Russians on the march again?

No, this time the United States has been faced with the prospect of an attack on the part of small, peaceful Nicaragua. I am not joking, and I exaggerate nothing. The leaders of the Washington administration have recently launched just such a, pardon the expression, schizophrenic campaign of frightening Americans with the Nicaraguan threat. This is connected with the fact that members of the U.S. Congress are refusing to support the President's proposal on granting the contras -- yesterday's partners in crime with Somoza and today hirelings of the CIA and other U.S. secret services -- aid amounting to $100 million.

Of course, it is not a question of the $100 million. For the CIA this amount is a mere bagatelle. The congressmen and the vast majority of Americans consider the course of the current administration to be fatal for the United States -- its actions in relation to Nicaragua and Central America as a whole. Many of them, not without reason, consider this policy to be an exact repetition of the U.S. actions that led to the Vietnam war. But the tragedy, shame, and horror of Vietnam have not been forgotten nor are they likely to be forgotten for some time by Americans. And now Nicaragua. Americans are being unscrupulously deceived as regards a country in which for 45 years the United States maintained the dictatorship of the Somoza family in power, if you like, the most inhumane and bloody in the history of Latin America. And when the people of Nicaragua threw off the yoke they now want to strangle it by means of hunger and the efforts of the contras, guardsmen of Somoza. But the problem is not only this. The Reagan administration would like to use the official allocation by Congress of $100 in help to the contras as a blank cheque for any actions in relations both to Nicaragua and to other states that are fighting for their independence. In other words, they would like to gain permission for the impelementation of their imperialist doctrine of neoglobalism.

Everything which has been said is true -- these are facts. But how does it happen that it in no way prevents the leaders in Washington and the White House from asserting their commitment to freedom, democracy, and human rights? They strangle by hunger -- this is freedom; they commit acts of violence -- this is democracy; they kill -- this is human rights. Thus words are being used, together with poison and explosives.

Turner Admits CIA Operations

LD111302 Moscow TASS in English 1254 GMT 11 Mar 86

[Text] New York March 11 TASS -- Stansfield Turner, former director of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, has admitted that the U.S. stages secret operations against the Sandinista government of Nicaragua.

The AP news agency reports that Turner who headed the CIA from 1977 to 1981 said that the Republican administration was staging secret operations in Nicaragua, but without much success. According to Turner, the White House tries to conceal the fact that it is making attempts to oust the Sandinistas from power. However, it is undoubtedly the purpose of its actions.

KORIONOV DECRIES BUSH'S 'COLD WAR' REMARKS

[Vitaliy Korionov "Political Observer's Notes": "Pangegyric to Crude Force"]

[Text] The wide-scale program for the consolidation of peace put forward by the 27th CPSU Congress has been welcomed by official Washington with obvious irritation and unconcealed dissatisfaction.

The Soviet peace initiatives do not suit those people who would like to keep the peoples in fear of a nuclear catastrophe. Belittling at any price the importance of the Soviet program for a nuclear-free world, freezing and perpetuating confrontation -- that is the true goal of these circles.

U.S. Vice President G. Bush has made his latest attempt of this kind on a trip to Fulton -- the city where 40 years ago W. Churchill delivered his notorious speech calling for a "cold war" to be declared on the socialist countries and for a "crusade" to be undertaken.

The decades that have elapsed since then have clearly revealed the bankruptcy of the "Fulton strategy." But there is no stopping its supporters. The high-ranking White House envoy invoked the specters of the past in order to inflame today's demons even further. He declared the NATO bloc to be Churchill's heir, keeping quiet, of course, about how just 5 years after the Fulton speech, in February 1951, it was the speech's author who warned: "By creating a U.S. base in Southeast England we are turning ourselves into a target and perhaps the center of a target." Bush pretended he was not familiar with this warning. His efforts were directed elsewhere: how to seek out new opportunities for pursuing a policy of diktat, how to undermine international cooperation still further. Bush's eulogy of NATO was accompanied by ferocious attacks on the United Nations. UN activity, he asserted, "has caused tremendous disillusionment." How? Primarily through the fact that the General Assembly "often adopts seditious resolutions" containing "attacks against the United States" and "attacks against the state of Israel." The U.S. vice president cannot make up his mind to state openly that the UN resolutions that he calls "seditious" are in reality calling for the end of the arms race and the prevention of the militarization of space. Yet the peoples know the truth!

The White House is observing with increasing alarm the mounting avalanche of popular indignation at Washington's aggressive predatory policy in Central America, Africa, and Asia. It is this policy that is the main reason for the deprivations and hardships the peoples are experiencing. Dollar imperialism is seeking at any price to divert from itself the righteous anger of hundreds of millions of people. Its stooges are endeavoring to blame...the communists for the difficulties experienced by the peoples who have chosen a free path of development. "Look at Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos," the vice president exlaims emotively, forgetting, however, to mention that it was the U.S. aggressor who for many years sowed death and destruction on the lands of these countries, bringing their peoples untold hardships and deprivations. The vice president called come what may for the stifling of the Nicarguan revolution, urging Congress to continue to arm the Somozaist holdouts and to supply Afghan dushmans with sophisticated weapons.

Bush's Fulton speech confirmed yet again that Washington is afraid of peace, that it is shying away from the very thought of honest international cooperation. Only it is time to understand that four decades of "cold war" have failed to bring laurels to the supporters of a policy of blackmail and violence. What grounds are there for supposing that this futile policy will be any more successful in the present-day world, where the forces of freedom and progress prevail?

REAGAN SPEECH 'COUNTERSTRIKE' TO SOVIET PROPOSALS

PM121611 Moscow SOVETSKAYA ROSSIYA in Russian 11 Mar 86 First Edition p 3

[Article by M. Knyazkov: "When the Ground Disappears From Under Your Feet..."]

[Excerpts] The broad peace program put forward at the 27th CPSU Congress seriously alarmed Washington.

However, it probably could not have been otherwise. The Kremlin's new clear and comprehensive proposal to ensure peoples' security met with a lively response in the hearts of millions of people on earth, including those in the United States. It is precisely for this reason that the White House decided to make a counterstrike by launching a powerful propaganda campaign that is still continuing to this day. A TASS correspondent tells SOVETSKAYA ROSSIYA readers about this.

The day after M.S. Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, delivered his Political Report, President Reagan appeared on American television. It was as if Geneva had hever been and as if no speech had been made afterward to both houses of Congress, in which the U.S. President swore to strive to conclude effective agreements on arms control and to improve Soviet-American relations. The master of the White House once again rammed it into Americans that, quote: "The Soviets only respect those who speak the language of force with them" and tried to put the blame for the arms race on the USSR.

Nevertheless, paradoxical as it may seem, this bellicose speech was more a demonstration of the Reagan administration's weakness of than a show of its strength. It was a kind of rearguard battle by Washington in the face of the broad Soviet peace offensive, which is supported by an increasing number of Americans and has been given powerful new impetus by the 27th CPSU Congress.

As THE NEW YORK TIMES reports, Reagan's closest advisers urgently recommended that he make this speech. And this is why. "Secret public opinion polls," the newspaper points out, "have registered a drop in public support for the arms buildup program that Reagan has conducted throughout his presidency."

Yes, the series of constructive Soviet initiatives, such as, for example, the moratorium on nuclear explosions or the proposal to enter the 21st century without nuclear weapons, are beginning to knock the ground from beneath the feet of arms race supporters. That is why Washington's propaganda attack on the effective peace and security program put forward at the CPSU Congress has boomeranged into criticism of the U.S. Administration. "Deceiving People" -- this is how Tom Wicker, prominent American columnist, headed his commentary on the president's speech.

Of course, the American press is a distorting mirror. And it is difficult to get a complete and, above all, objective picture of events in Moscow through that press. Nevertheless, it is noticeable how avidly Americans seize on reports from the Soviet capital, seeking in them an answer to the questions troubling all mankind.

ARTICLE CONSIDERS U.S. POSTURE TOWARD SOCIALISM

[A. Leontyev article under the "Publicist's Notes" rubric: "In the Name of the Future"]

[Excerpt] A correspondent of America's ABC TV asserts that on the day the CPSU Congress opened, the U.S. President was throwing snowballs in the White House grounds. He has also done a great many other less inoffensive things recently. He has received the ringleaders of the anti-Nicaraguan gangs in his office and tried to persuade congressmen to allocate them $100 million. He has read reports about the course of the "undeclared wars" against the peoples of Afghanistan and Angola.

But the main event was delivering an address to the nation twice -- on radio and television -- aimed at "pushing through" the latest increase in the military budget and beginning a new round in the arms race. Dozens of times the address mentioned "the Russians" in the role of bugbear and spoke about the need for a "tough approach" to relations with the USSR.

"It is typical," the French newspaper L'HUMANITE noted, "that Reagan should again resort to 'muscle flexing' immediately after M.S. Gorbachev's Political Report, which confirmed the Soviet plan for the complete elimination of nuclear weapons. In essence, Reagan's statements represent the reply to the Soviet peace plan, whereas his letter to M.S. Gorbachev is no more than a propaganda maneuver." The White House boss was extremely irritated, LE QUOTIDIEN DE PARIS added, by the fact that the Soviet proposals, reaffirmed at the Moscow congress, are receiving a broad response and are being actively propagandized throughout the world. Reproaches and threats have rained down on the American correspondents who covered the work of the congress. They have been accused of "weak criticism" of the USSR and "insufficient patriotism," since when they have tried to "turn over a new leaf."

If you let U.S. reactionaries have their way they would ban not only our congress but our Soviet land, too. Is that not what they tried to do in the first 16 years after the October Revolution? President F. Roosevelt liked to recall the occasion that prompted him to establish diplomatic relations with the USSR. "In 1933," he used to say, "my wife visited a school in our country. In one classroom she saw a map showing a large blank area. She asked what it was and was told that you were not allowed to mention the name of that place. It was the Soviet Union." But now Washington is trying to slander the great socialist land to such an extent that in Americans' eyes it seems to be completely black.

Many enemies of socialism would prefer to wipe it from the face of the earth completely. It prevents the rich from duping, oppressing, and plundering the peoples and making a fortune from the arms race and military adventures. "Let us stop vacillating; let us use our power to consign Marxism-Leninism to the rubbish heap of history," Reagan blurted out on 8 June 1983. He cited the "Soviet military threat" as the pretext for a "crusade."

Washington discovers that "threat" just about everywhere. The Soviet Union has adopted a course of accelerating socioeconomic development? Beware! "This could turn the Russians into an even more formidable adversary," some U.S. economists say in panic. The USSR is showing great concern for the education of officer cadres. Congressmen are in alarm: "There is the serious danger (?!) that the Soviet officer corps is better prepared intellectually and has a deeper understanding of history." Another reason for displeasure!...

But we do not intend satisfying anyone, since we do not intend consigning anyone to the "rubbish heap of history." We oppose military confrontation and support peaceful cooperation, free development, and identical security for all countries and peoples. Each people decides and decides alone which system to choose and which banners to march under into the 21st century. We have chosen once and for all the most just and humane system in the world -- socialism. Almost 70 years ago U.S., British, French, and Japanese interventionists tried to drown it in blood, and the fascist scum tried to crush it with their tanks and suffocate it in gas chambers. Now thousands of U.S. and NATO nuclear missiles and bombers are targeted on it. We have defended our system in fierce fighting under the Communist Party's leadership and are always ready to stand up for it. We urge the West to take the path of peace. In our opinion, peace is the only road to take into the 21st century and beyond.

In the postwar decades the United States has stockpiled vast mountains of the very latest weaponry and combat hardware.

But it has no ideas to fire people's hearts and stir their energy and reason. "We, our nation," Presdient John Kennedy complained, "are now experiencing a need greater than the need for atomic, aerial, financial, industrial, or even human power -- it is the need for the power of ideas." He is echoed by the well-known U.S. politician G. Kennan: "We have nothing to teach the world. We must recognize that we have no answer to the questions facing human society in the modern era."

Capitalism demonstrates to the whole world the poverty of its philosophy and the unattainability of the goals of its aggressive and adventurist policy, which contains the threat of mankind's self-destruction. Socialism, on the other hand, demonstrates its indisputable advantages and indestructible belief in the triumph of Lenin's immortal ideas -- the ideas of peace and creation, freedom and happiness for all peoples of the world. And that was most convincingly demonstrated once again by the 27th CPSU Congress.

PROFESSED ROLE OF U.S. PEACE INSTITUTE DISPUTED

[Report by own correspondent V. Soldatov: "'Hawks' in the Role of 'Doves'"]

[Text] New York -- They are absurd but quite real, the American critic W. Gibson remarked with regard to certain characters in Shakespeare's comedy "The Merry Wives of Windsor." The activity of the "U.S. Peace Institute" is quite absurd from the viewpoint of common sense but, at the same time, absolutely real from the viewpoint of factual authenticity.

Set up by decision of Congress, this institute is supposed to "promote the achievement of international peace." But the people whom President R. Reagan appointed the directors of this institute are as concerned about strengthening peace as a cat is concerned about the safety of chicks.

The "peace institute" is headed by J. Moore, chairman of the Oceans Policy Group under the Republican National Committee. This group and its chairman were resolutely opposed to the United States subscribing to the international treaty that proclaimed seabed resources the common property of mankind. Washington refused to subscribe to the treaty.

Next on the list of directors is B. (WAINROD), who heads the Heritage Foundation's foreign and defense policy studies group. This organization of extreme right-wingers has drawn up the most reactionary ideas for the Reagan administration, including the idea of "opposition" to the Soviet Union.

(D. Bark) is engaged on roughly the same questions in a similar reactionary establishment -- the Hoover Institute of War, Revolution, and Peace. In 1980 (Bark) took an active part in R. Reagan's election campaign, advising him on international questions.

No less colorful is the figure of another director -- E. Kirkpatrick, husband of the well-known J. Kirkpatrick. This professor, who openly espouses anti-Soviet views, wrote a book in which he warns Americans of "communist activeness in the world."

According to the charter of the "U.S. Peace Institute," the secretaries of defense and state, the director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, and the head of the Nationa Defense Institute are also directors. At the institute's first sessoin, held at the end of February, the secretaries of defense and state were absent.

In his place the defense secretary sent his assistant R. Perle, one of the most vehement anti-Soviets not only at the Pentagon but also, probably, in the United States.

Other participants in the session also plainly have nothing in common with the struggle for peace and espouse anti-Soviet views. General R. Lawrence, who represented the National Defense Institute, for example, campaigns for increased spending on arms.

You can imagine how these people laughed when they unexpectedly found themselves in the role of "doves." Probably some thought: How did that one get here, for he is even further to the right than I am?

[The following paragraph is boxed off within the article] When the draft law on setting up the "U.S. Peace Institute" was being discussed in Congress, skeptics claimed that this whole venture was pointless and would end in a farce. And this is just what has happened. The skeptics evidently knew that the American right-wingers in power are organically incapable of being guided by common sense and that they conceal their imperialist policy behind words about a desire for peace.

U.S. REQUEST FOR 20-YEAR OKINAWA EXTENSION NOTED

[From "The World Today" program presented by Igor Fesunenko]

[Text] In the first edition of the review I quoted this morning's report from Tokyo which said that the United States is trying to pile up on the Japanese a considerable proportion of the cost of maintaining the communications center for the U.S. Navy at Yokohama. And here it seems that the Yankees' appetite grows with the eating and this theme is developing, so to speak, like a continuing novel.

A few hours later today, another report came in from Japan. It says that the U.S. Command have asked the Japanese Government to extend for a further 20 years -- until 2007 -- the agreement that gives the United States the right to use its military base on the island of Okinawa. According to a Japanese press report, the inhabitants of Okinawa with the support of democratic organizations in the country have launched a fight against the Americans throwing their weight about on this island. At a meeting which took place in the town of Naha, more than 6,000 people taking part adopted a resolution protesting the Pentagon's plans to prolong the occupation of Okinawa.

ARKHIPOV SAID SECOND CHOICE FOR PRC VISIT

HK130746 Hong Kong AFP in English 0728 GMT 13 Mar 86

[By Pierre-Antoine Donnet]

[Excerpt] Beijing, March 13 (AFP) -- Moscow decided at the last moment to downgrade its delegation due here this weekend for Sino-Soviet economic and trade talks, Soviet diplomatic sources said here Thursday.

The Kremlin had first planned to send Nikolay Talyzin, a first deputy premier and newly-appointed alternate Politburo member close to party chief Mikhail Gorbachev as Moscow's chief delegate to a Sino-Soviet commission meeting on trade and the economy, the sources said.

But Soviet authorities changed their minds at the last moment and decided to send instead Ivan Arkhipov, who is also a first deputy premier, but aged 78 is regarded as less powerful, with only Communist Party Central Committee membership, the sources said.

This was confirmed by Western diplomats, who saw it as a sign that a more realistic mood was setting in over Sino-Soviet relations, which had been touched with a whiff of euphoria in the past two years.

[Text] Moscow March 11 TASS -- Intergovernmental Soviet-Japanese consultations on the development of bilateral trade and economic realtions have opened here today. A delegation of representatives of Japanese governmental organizations led by Japanese Deputy Foreign Minister Reishi Teshima has arrived in Moscow for the consultations. The Soviet side at the talks is headed by USSR Deputy Foreign Minister Aleksey Manzhulo.

A broad range of issues is to be discussed in thecourse of the current consultations, the head of the Soviet delegation said, opening the meeting. It is necessary to consolidate in action the positive changes, which have manifested themselves in bilateral relations, to exchange views on issues of mutual trade and economic cooperation, to generalize the accumulated positive experience and draw lessons from the negative phenomena in the development of trade and economic relations in recent past.

A broadening of Soviet-Japanese trade and economic relations is of tremendous significance for strengthening relations between the two countries, Japanese Deputy Foreign Minister Reishi Teshima pointed out in his speech. The current consultations, he stressed, are being conducted on the basis of the new trade and payments agreement, which was signed during the visit to Japan of Eduard Shevardnadze, USSR foreign minister in January this year.

Among the broad range of issues on the agenda of the current talks are also those pertaining to the holding of the tenth meeting of the Japanese-Soviet and Soviet-Japanese committees on economic cooperation and the holding of a Japanese industrial exhibition in Moscow in autumn this year, Reishi Teshima said.

KANSAI-SOVIET TRADE FEDERATION INAUGURATED

[Report by PRAVDA own correspondent Yu. Vdovin and TASS correspondent S. Logachev: "In the Interests of Good-Neighborliness"]

[Text] Osaka, 11 Mar -- The constituent congress of the Kansai region Japanese-Soviet trade federation was held today in Osaka. It includes about 2,000 trade and industrial companies, firms, and economic organizations of Western Japan. D. Kawakatsu, an influential representative of the region's business circles and chairman of the board of directors of the Nankai Electric Railways company, was elected president of the federation.

Kansai is Japan's second biggest trade and economic center after the capital's Kanto region. It accounts for about one-fifth of the total number of enterprises of Japanese industry's production sectors, nearly 10 percent of the GNP, 20 percent of the country's foreign trade turnover, and one-fourth of the volume of Soviet-Japanese trade.

The new federation sets itself the goal of promoting the expansion of trade and economic relations between the two countries, propagandizing the Soviet Union's achievements in economic development, and further activating Japanese-Soviet cultural exchange.

Addressing the gathering, D. Kawakatsu, the federation's president, expressed the hope that the creation of this organization will promote the intensification of mutual understanding and the consolidation of good-neighborly relations between the two countries. At the conclusion of the congress a seminar was held on "the new 5-year plan for the Soviet Union's economic development and the prospects of Japanese-Soviet trade and economic relations."

TASS REPORTS FURTHER ON CASTRO'S VISIT TO DPRK

[Text] Pyongyang March 11 TASS -- There is no task more topical now than the task of saving the world from war conflagration the danger of which largely heightened following aggressive designs of international, above all American imperialism. This has been stated by Kim Il-song, general secretary of the Central Committee of the Workers Party of Korea, president of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea at a mass meeting which was held in Pyongyang today. The meeting was held in honour of the party and governmental delegation of the Republic of Cuba now on a visit here. The delegation is led by Fidel Castro, first secretary of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Cuba, chairman of the State Council and the Council of Ministers.

The new peace initiatives of the CPSU particularly the programme of full elimination of nuclear weapons which was made in the January 15 statement by General Secretary of the CPSU Central Committee Mikhail Gorbachev are of great significance for averting a thermonuclear catastrophe, ending the arms race, stressed the DPRK leader.

The recent 27th CPSU Congress provides yet another eloquent evidence of the Soviet Union's consistent foreign policy course. Unity of socialist and nonaligned countries which are energetically and consistently fighting for diminishing nuclear threat is the indispensable condition for the triumph of the cause of the peace forces. A considerable contribution to the consolidation of security could be made by establishment of nuclear free zones in different parts of the world, including the Korean peninsula where a dangerous seat of tension is being stirred up by U.S. military preparations, said Kim Il-song.

Fidel Castro noted in his speech that Cuba and the DPRK are unanimous in the striving to curb aggressive designs of American imperialism, to prevent the arms race from being spread to outer space. He fully supported the rightful struggle waged by the Korean people for peaceful democratic unification of the country and expressed gratitude to the USSR, DPRK and other socialist countries for the assistance in strengthening Cuba's defensive capability.

A treaty of friendship and cooperation was concluded today between the DPRK and Republic of Cuba. The treaty was signed by Kim Il-song, general secretary of the Central Committee of the Workers Party of Korea, president of the DPRK, and Fidel Castro, first secretary of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Cuba, chairman of the State Council and the Councils of Ministers.

Opening Activities

[Text] Patna, Bihar March 12 TASS -- The 13th congress of the Communist Party of India opened here today. It is attended by over 1,300 delegates representing 479,000 party members. Some 30 delegations of communist, workers' and revolutionary-democratic parties, national liberation movements, a number of democratic and international organizations came to attend the congress, including a CPSU delegation led by Petr Demichev, alternate member of the Political Bureau of the CPSU Central Committee.

The opening speech was delivered at the congress by Rajeshwara Rao, general secretary of the National Council of the Communist Party of India. He said that the Communist Party of India had always been a dependable detachment of the international communist movement. Even in the most difficult conditions it raised high the great banner of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism.

Rajeshwara Rao expressed high appreciation of the results of the 27th CPSU Congress. I am sure that the Political Report delivered by Mikhail Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, as well as other documents and resolutions of the congress, will be of great support for the forces fighting for peace, socialism, democracy and national liberation, he said.

The international situation has become more complicated of late, the speaker pointed out. Disregarding world public opinion, imperialism, primarily U.S. imperialism, is stepping up the nuclear arms race. A dangerous and complicated situation has taken shape in India too. This happened first of all, through the fault of the ruling circles of the U.S. and its allies which are striving to destabilize the internal life of this country, Rajeshwara Rao said. In these conditions Indian Communists should take a more active part in the solution of important problems facing the country and the world. We shall spare no effort for upholding the interests of the people, the unity and territorial integrity of our homeland, for supporting all those who are fighting against imperialism, for peace on earth, Rajeshwara Rao said in conclusion.

CPSU Sends Greetings

[Text] To the 13th Communist Party of India [CPI] Congress

Dear Comrades!

The CPSU Central Committee warmly greets the delegates to the 13th CPI Congress.

Your congress is taking place in a complex situation. It has been caused by the fact that the most aggressive circles of imperialism are continuing their line toward military superiority and are seeking to dictate their will to other peoples.

The Soviet Union proceeds from the premise that in the nuclear age ther is not and cannot be a sensible alternative to peaceful coexistence between states with different social systems. The recent 27th CPSU Congress put forward a broad program for ensuring peace for all peoples.

The prevention of war accords with the aspirations of the peoples of the entire world. They resolutely demand that the arms race be halted, that its emergence into space be prevented, and that the threat of nuclear annihilation looming over the world be eliminated.

The CPSU believes that mankind's very important task in preserving peace on earth can be achieved by the pooled efforts of all peace-loving forces, which can thwart the dangerous designs of the aggressive circles of imperialism.

Our congress has adopted the new draft of the program that provides for the planned and comprehensive improvement of socialism and Soviet society's further advance toward communism. The basic guidelines for the USSR's socioeconomic development have been adopted. The practical activity of the party and entire Soviet people will reveal still more fully the potential and advantages of the socialist system.

The Soviet Union highly rates the CPI's vigorous actions for peace and against the threat of nuclear war. It is making a great contribution to the development and consolidation of friendship and cooperation between India and the Soviet Union, which accords with the fundamental interests of the two countries' peoples and the consolidation of the cause of peace and security in Asia and throughout the world.

We wish the fraternal CPI and all Indian Communists further successes in merging with all democratic and national patriotic forces to strengthen the country's national independence, unity, and territorial integirty, in the struggle for the Indian working people's vital interests and for the Country's development along the path of democracy and social progress.

Long live Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism!

May the friendship and cooperation between the Soviet Union and India strengthen and develop!

The CPSU Central Committee

U.S., UK 'MISINFORMATION' ABOUT DRA CITED

PM121512 Moscow IZVESTIYA in Russian 12 Mar 86 Morning Edition p 4

[Report by correspondent A. Krivopalov under the rubric "Behind the Scenes of Subversion": "Launch Sites for Soap Bubbles; British Journalist Exposes Methods of Misinformation About Afghanistan"]

[Text] London -- "The majority of the British correspondents who covered the Falklands war were indignant that the British Ministry of Defense fed them with one-sided reports of the fighting. Supported by colleagues from other countries, they swore then: "Never again will they be able to use us in that way." This is a passage from an article by Jonathan Steele published in London's THE GUARDIAN. It also states that journalists have not kept that oath...

The article describes how Western journalists are worked on by spokesmen for the U.S. and British Embassies in Islamabad and Delhi. At official briefings on the situation in Afghanistan they use the same method that was tried and tested by the British military department during the crisis over the Malvinas (Falkland) Islands.

Recalling the oath, Steele sarcastically remarks: "The proud stand taken then unfortunately differs from the present actions." THE GUARDIAN staffer claims: Attending meetings with the press organized by the U.S. and British diplomatic missions, journalists are given tendentious information on what is happening in Afghanistan and usually pass it on without checking it.

"The tone is set by the news agencies with their desire to provide a 'scoop' and a 'sensational headline' -- which frequently gains the upper hand over true skepticism and sober judgment," J. Steele goes on to write.

At a recent briefing held at the U.S. Embassy in Islamabad, Steele was astounded to hear that the city of Paghman was "firmly in the hands of the resistance forces." The thing is that shortly before that press conference Steele had been in Afghanistan and had traveled to... Paghman. He had seen that there was no trace of dushmans there.

The primary sources of the information which U.S. and British diplomats "share" with the writing fraternity at meetings with the press in Pakistan or India are dispatches from the U.S. and British missions in Kabul. Speaking ironically about this practice, Steele writes:

SOMETIMES THEIR REPORTS ARE COMPILED ON THE BASIS OF RUMORS WHICH THE EMBASSY COOK GETS FROM THE MARKET ALONG WITH PROVISIONS. [passage printed in upper case]

"All villages within a radius of 40 km of Jalalabad were destroyed in the course of fighting -- this 'news' was presented to correspondents at a briefing," Jonathan Steele goes on to write. "But I went there that same week and saw that region's prosperous settlements."

In the opinion of the British journalist, the falsified picture of the situation in Afghanistan is needed to cheer up those who support the dushmans politically and militarily. The chief thing is that the information selected in this way should fulfill its purpose today, and then let the soap bubbles burst. This is how the experienced correspondent of London's THE GUARDIAN concludes his testimony.

It would be a good thing if this lesson were also learned by the other British journalists who seek to hush up the grave crimes of the bandits and counterrevolutionaries waging a doomed struggle against the people's power in Afghanistan.

KARMAL INTERVIEWED ON IMPACT OF CPSU CONGRESS

PM111619 Moscow SOVETSKAYA ROSSIYA in Russian 9 Mar 86 Single Edition p 7

[A. Borovik interview with Babrak Karmal, general secretary of the PDPA Central Committee and chairman of the DRA Revolutionary Council: "In the Vanguard of Progress"; date, place not specified]

[Text] [Borovik] Comrade Karmal, you headed the PDPA delegation that attended the 27th CPSU Congress. What, in your view, are the main results of the Soviet Communists' forum?

[Karmal] Every CPSU congress is a historic event, a new milestone in the life of all progressive mankind. The 27th CPSU Congress once again demonstrated the unshakable prestige which the CPSU enjoys in the international arena. The Soviet Communists' forum confirmed that the Soviet Union is at the head of the worldwide struggle for peace and social progress. The party's creative, Leninist approach to solving topical domestic and international problems was fully reflected in the Political Report and other documents submitted to the congress. The congress analyzed in depth the major changes that have occurred in the life of the USSR and the entire contemporary world over the past decades. The congress not only drew important conclusions from the past, but it also defined the main future tasks. The documents submitted to the congress represent a major new contribution by the CPSU to the treasure-house of revolutionary theory.

[Borovik] Could you briefly describe the current situation relating to Afghanistan? Especially in view of the fact that the need to normalize that situation was also discussed at the congress.

[Karmal] I am convinced that the implementation of the Soviet peace program set forth in the 15 January statement by M.S. Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, and endorsed at the congress is of great significance for the DRA too. At present, the undeclared war unleashed against the DRA by imperialism and regional reaction is not only not abating but, on the contrary, is spreading. The United States has spent vast sums of money on this criminal war in recent years.

[Borovik] How much, approximately?

[Karmal] Around $1.5 billion. Thousands of armed bandits instructed to plunder, kill, and destroy our homes are annually infiltrated into Afghanistan from the territory of Pakistan, which has been transformed into a bridgehead for permanent aggression against the DRA, and from Iran.

[Borovik] In your speech at the congress you cited an Afghan proverb which is very much to the point: Before you build a house, choose your neighbor. This ancient axiom has lost none of its topicality today. This is emphasized by the fact that Afghanistan also has friendly neighbors who are its loyal friends.

[Karmal] Quite. The USSR's entire history is a history of fraternal international assistance to fighters for justice and national liberation. Recently we celebrated the 65th anniversary of the friendship treaty between Afghanistan and Russia. We will never forget the tremendous, selfless assistance given us by the Soviet Union. Friendship and cooperation with the USSR are the guarantee of our independence, sovereignty, and territorial integrity.

[Borovik] In recent times, Afghanistan has achieved new successes in the economic sphere, and the social base of the April Revolution has been markedly expanded. Could you tell us in detail about this, please?

[Karmal] Despite the war, we look to the future with confidence. The implementation of the land and water reform continues in the country' the scale of construction is increasing; and the struggle against illiteracy is gathering momentum. We have elaborated the main avenues of the DRA's socioeconomic development for the period from March 1986 through March 1991. The PDPA attaches great importance to strengthening the DRA Armed Forces. After comprehensively analyzing the domestic and external situations we have drawn up a concept for the expansion of the social base of revolutionary power. In accordance with this line of action, the organs of state power and administration were enlarged by involving in them a considerable number of non-party representatives of various strata and sections of the society and of the country's nationalities and ethnic groups. The Loya Jirga and the Supreme Tribal Jirga expressed full support for our party's domestic and foreign policy. However, it is too soon to be content. A great deal remains to be done.

To conclude our conversation, I would like to express sincere wishes to the friendly Soviet people for further successes on the path of implementing the historic decisions of the 27th CPSU Congress.

ARTICLE VIEWS BACKGROUND TO PHILIPPINES EVENTS

PM051541 Moscow LITERATURNAYA GAZETA in Russian 5 Mar 86 p 9

[Mariam Salganik article under the rubric "We Report the Details": "'Rescue Operation': Episode Two"]

[Excerpts] "As a parody of democracy, the play has even acquired a kind of theatrical charm," America's TIME wrote of the Philippine elections, when it was announced that Ferdinand Marcos had gained 10,807,179 votes against 9,491,716 for Corazon Aquino.

Counting the votes took 8 days. The 30 official counters, processing the figures on the counting commission's computers, gave up, stating that the results of the vote were being falsified by Marcos' supporters. The 104 Catholic bishops (90 percent of the Philippines' population are Catholics) declared the elections to be an "unprecedented case of misrepresentation" and called on Marcos to admit the truth. Marcos declared himself the winner and demanded to be sworn in.

White House Deputy Press Secretary Larry Speakes was quite right when he said that U.S. policy toward the Philippines "was consistent from the first." Substantial U.S. economic and military "aid" plus the rents paid for the military bases on Philippine territory kept the Marcos government afloat for a long time. However, judging by the present state of the Philippine economy, these resources mainly stayed in the pockets of the presidential entourage and the Army leadership, where corruption and political gangsterims had begun to acquire a downright fantastic scale. Moreover the masses' dissatisfaction began to swell the ranks of the rebel movement -- the New People's Army, whose numbers are now estimated at 30,000. Even within the Philippine Army a movement for reforms began.

The "Communist threat" which all the left-wing Philippine forces represent in the U.S. Administration's eyes, the threat to the bases, and the threat to U.S. economic interests forced it to demand from Marcos a more flexible policy, but that turned out badly for Marcos. In 1983 Marcos' oldest political opponent, Benigno Aquino, who had been allowed to return home after long exile, was shot at Manila airport. The sinister General Fabian Ver, Marcos' closest assistant, was accused of the murder -- and at once acquitted.

The storm of indignation aroused by these events made both Marcos and the U.S. Administration act. Very reluctantly, Marcos scheduled presidential elections for 7 February 1986. The New People's Army and the left-wing nationalist organization "Bayan" decided to boycott them, and all the other anti-Marcos forces united around B. Aquino's widow -- Corazon Aquino.

It is hard to say what percentage of the votes she actually won (around 70 percent, it is believed in the Philippines), but one thing is clear -- she received the mass support of the Philippine people.

At 0500 hours on 26 February Marcos and his family were shipped out of the Philippines by a U.S. Air Force plane. The operation to rescue the ex-president echoed the operation to rescue the ex-dictator of Haiti -- so recent that many people suggest that Reagan's "delayed reaction" to Marcos' stubbornness is explained by his reluctance to play out "episode two." The plane marked with a red cross had hardly landed on Guam Island when the Reagan administration recognized Corazon Aquino's government.

What next? Will Corazon Aquino be able to preserve the unity of the anti-Marcos front and set about healing the gravely sick Philippine economy, how independent will her government's foreign policy course be? One thing is now clear: the people, who voted for Aquino, expect substantial changes from her in the Philippines' domestic and foreign course.

U.S. TO REVIVE THAI BASES AS REGIONAL OPTION

[Text] Admiral Ronald Hays, commander, U.S. Armed Forces in the Pacific and Indian Ocean, recently paid a 3-day visit to Thailand. It has to be said that high-ranking Pentagon officials have recently begun turning up so frequently in Bangkok that the Asian countries' press hardly has time to record them. But this visit attracted the newspapers' special attention, giving rise to many commentaries. And this is why. First, the Pentagon chief himself -- Caspar Weinberger -- is expected to arrive in Bangkok early in April, where he will sign a number of agreements on behalf of the U.S. Administration. And R. Hays' talks with Thai Prime Minister Prem Tinsulanon and with A. Kamlang-ek, commander of the Armed Forces, were regarded as "preparing the appropriate ground" for these agreements.

Second, the annual American-Thai Cobra Gold-86 military maneuvers are soon to begin. Approximately 20,000 soldiers will participate in them. Landing, ground, and air operations will be rehearsed, using the latest arms. As already reported, these exercises will be conducted for the first time in direct proximity to the Thai-Cambodian border -- which is correctly viewed by the public in Southeast Asian countries as a provocation against the PRK. In addition, there was thorough discussion of the question of setting up American weapons and ammunition dumps on Thai territory. As the press reports, Weinberger will write in the final period in an agreement which is being prepared during this visit. The Pentagon's intention to set up in Thailand a network of strategic dumps like those that exist in the FRG and South Korea, Japan's ASAHI writes, attests to far-reaching plans.

Newspapers also point out that in Thailand, R. Hays touched on the question of "demothballing" the U.S. air bases there, which were actively used during the years of the aggressive Vietnam War. As is known, those bases played an important role in the conduct of American troops' combat operations in Indochina. Aircraft took off from those bases to bomb the cities and villages of Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia. In 1976 the United States, defeated in the "dirty war" against the peoples of Indochina, was forced to close down those installations and withdraw its troops from Thailand. But a certain number of American military personnel are there even now. And Utapao base has been used extensively by U.S. military aircraft for 5 years now in joint exercises with the Thai Army.

By all accounts, the theme of the Pentagon's return to its former positions will be the leading topic in Weinberger's talks with the Thai leadership. The plans to "reanimate" the U.S. military bases are creating growing alarm among the Thai public and in broad political circles in all countries of the region.

This alarm has assumed a still greater scale in connection with the well-known events in the Philippines. The press draws attention to a report by a special research group of the U.S. Congress, which states that in the event of "the impossibility of continuing to use the American military bases at Clark Field and Subic Bay in the Philippines, they could be relocated in other parts of Asia." It is no secret that the most right-wing circles in Bangkok are prepared to offer the Pentagon its former bases on Thai territory "as an option."

As we see, proclaiming and defending its imperial interests in Asia and the Pacific, the United States intends to continue increasing its military presence in that part of the world. Here an exclusively subordinate role is allocated to other peoples. This policy is fraught with the possibility of exacerbating tension and kindling new military conflicts.

[Text] Moscow March 12 TASS -- Eduard Shevardnadze, a member of the Political Bureau of of the CPSU Central Committee and Foreign Minister of the USSR, will pay an official friendly visit to the People's Republic of Poland in the second half of this month at the invitation of the Polish Government.

SED POLITBURO PRAISES CPSU CONGRESS, GORBACHEV

[Text] Berlin March 12 TASS -- The 27th CPSU Congress enriches the treasury of the experience of the fraternal parties in socialist development and creates powerful stimuli for their close cooperation. The consistent implementation of the course towards the speeding up of the socio-economic development of the Soviet society will go together with the development of the forces of socialism in the world and the growth of its power of attraction.

This is pointed out in a statement of the Political Bureau of the Central Committee of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany circulated here. The session of the Political Bureau heard a report of Erich Honecker, general secretary of the Central Committee of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany, president of the GDR State Council, on the results of the 27th CPSU Congress and on the activities of the GDR delegation there.

The 27th CPSU Congress demonstrated the unbreakable unity between socialism and peace, as well as the constructive approach of the Soviet Union to the most burning problems of today. The Political Bureau of the Central Committee of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany, all the communists and the working people of the GDR welcome the new proposal on the creation of an all-embracing system of international security put forward from the rostrum of the congress, the statement says. The Political Bureau regarded the statement of Mikhail Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, of January 15, 1986, as a program of saving mankind from a nuclear catastrophe, the only one in its way, the program that ensures a historic opportunity for a peaceful future.

[Unattributed report: "Glorious Anniversary"]

[Text] A meeting of representatives of the capital's public and of Moscow garrison servicemen devoted to the 30th anniversary of the GDR National People's Army [NVA] was held at the M.V. Frunze Central House of the Soviet Army on 7 March.

In the presidium of the meeting were Marshal of the Soviet Union V.G. Kulikov, USSR first deputy defense minister and commander in chief of the Warsaw Pact states Joint Armed Forces; Admiral A.I. Sorokin, first deputy chief of the Soviet Army and Navy Main Political Directorate; Army General A.I. Gribkov, chief of staff of the Warsaw Pact states Joint Armed Forces; generals, admirals, and officers of the Soviet Armed Forces; veterans of the Great Patriotic War; and representatives of the capital's public. E. Winkelmann, GDR ambassador to the USSR, was also there.

The meeting was opened by A.I. Kostenko, deputy chairman of Moscow Gorispolkom.

The report was delivered by Marshal of the Soviet Union V.G. Kulikov.

The victory of the Soviet Union and its valiant Armed Forces in the Great Patriotic War, the speaker pointed out, brought the German people liberation from Hitlerite fascism and gave them the opportunity to embark on the path of progressive socialist development. The development of the GDR as an autonomous, independent state took place in an uncompromising struggle against the forces of external reaction and the attempts by the West's militarist circles to halt the country's movement along the socialist path. The GDR's entry into the Warsaw Pact Organization considerably strengthened its international position and political independence and ensured the Republic's territorial inviolability.

The development of the GDR NVA -- an Army of the new socialist type -- is inseparably linked with the history of the German working class' struggle for tis social liberation and for socialist transformations. Right from the beginning, the SED was the directing force in the building and development of the GDR NVA. Soviet people and Army and Navy servicemen see the GDR people and Army as their comrades and allies in the struggle for cmomon communist ideals. The combat friendship of our Armies' servicemen is strong and unbreakable.

The allied Armies' servicemen are well aware that the grand programs outlined by the 27th CPSU Congress and the fraternal communist and workers parties' congresses will be carried out in an intense struggle between the forces of peace and progress and the forces of imperialist reaction. GDR NVA personnel are fulfilling their international duty with honor, making a worthy contribution to further strengthening the defense capability of their own country and of our entire military-political alliance.

The meeting was addressed by Major General G. Oldenburg, military, naval, and air attache at the GDR Embassy in the USSR. He pointed out that the unbreakable friendship and cooperation between the peoples and Armed Forces of the GDR and the USSR serve the interests of both countries' peoples and the interests of peace and socialism.

On the same day Maj Gen G. Oldenburg, military, naval, and air attache at the GDR Embassy in the USSR, gave a reception to mark the GDR NVA's 30th anniversary.

Present at the reception were Marshal of the Soviet Union V.G. Kulikov, USSR first deputy defense minister and commander in chief of the Warsaw Pact states Joint Armed Forces; Adm A.I. Sorokin, first deputy chief of the Soviet Army and Navy Main Political Directorate; generals, admirals, and officers of the Soviet Armed Forces. The guests included military, naval, and air attaches at the embassies of a number of foreign states in the Soviet Union. E. Winkelmann, GDR ambassador to the USSR, was present.

REPORT ON RESULTS OF SPAIN'S NATO REFERENDUM

LD130647 Moscow TASS in English 0637 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] Madrid March 13 TASS -- Preliminary results of the nation-wide referendum on the issue of NATO membership were officially announced in Spain after 99 per cent of the ballots had been counted. A majority of voters (52.2 per cent of those who took part in the referendum) favored the nation's continued membership of the NATO alliance. About 40 per cent of those who took part in the referendum voted against the participation in NATO. Before the voting the ruling Socialist Workers' Party of Spain had launched a high-pressure propaganda campaign under the motto "vote 'for' in the interests of the country." The party's leadership used to say that the withdrawal from NATO would allegedly lead to the country's "isolation."

The Soviet delegation emphasized its readiness to seek, through joint efforts, a mutually acceptable compromise solution to this important question for both sides.

CARLSSON ELECTED NEW SWEDISH PRIME MINISTER

LD121325 Moscow TASS in English 1038 GMT 12 Mar 86

[Text] Stockholm March 12 TASS -- TASS correspondent Nikolay Vukolov reporting. The Swedish Riksdag (parliament) today elected Ingvar Carlsson new prime minister of Sweden.

Mr. Carlsson is a prominent Swedish political figure. He is currently chairman of the Social Democratic Labor Party (SDLP) of Sweden. He was elected party chairman at a meeting of the SDLP board held soon after the tragic death of Olof Palme.

For many years Carlsson closely cooperated with the late Swedish prime minister. He shares Mr. Palme's political views. At different times Ingvar Carlsson held a number of ministerial posts. Prior to Palme's assassination he was deputy prime minister and minister with special responsibility for research.

After being elected SDLP chairman Mr Carlsson said that the policy of Sweden, including on the international scene, would remain unchanged and stressed that the Swedish prime minister should devote as much attention to international affairs as Mr. Palme had done.

Carlsson reiterated this stance in connection with a special message addressed to the Swedish Government by the leaders of five countries, co-authors of the New Delhi Declaration. The message reaffirmed their determination to continue work for peace and nuclear disarmament in cooperation with the new Swedish prime minister. The duty of Sweden's representative, Mr Carlsson said in this connection, is to aasist the forming of opinion directed against nuclear war.

JOINT FINNISH TALKS ON OIL, TRADE HELD IN MOSCOW

LD111531 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1300 GMT 11 Mar 86

[Text] Problems caused by the collapse in oil prices for trade between Finland and the Soviet Union are currently being surveyed in Moscow. The Finnish negotiators are led by Under Secretary of State for Trade at the Foreign Ministry Paavo Kaarlehto and the Soviet side by Deputy Minister of Foreign Trade Aleksey Manzhulo. The aim is to survey ways of assuring the presentation of the level of Finnish exports. No final solution is expected to be reached in Moscow now, because clearer estimates of developments in oil prices this year are needed as a basis for solutions.

Under Secretary Kaarlehto returns to Helsinki tomorrow.

Talks End

LD122245 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1400 GMT 12 Mar 86

[Text] Under Secretary of State Paavo Kaarlehto today ended his 3-day talks in Moscow on the problems of Finnish-Soviet trade. At the talks the Soviet side was represented by Deputy Foreign Trade Minister Aleksey Manzhulo. Yrjoe Lansipuro reports from Moscow:

In Moscow this week, discussions were held at the level of officials about the problem caused to Soviet-Finnish trade by the falling world market price of oil. If trade was balanced at the old oil prices, the new lower prices of oil cause a deeper dent on the import side the lower oil prices fall. Now Under Secretary of State Paavo Kaarlehto and Deputy Minister of Foreign Trade Aleksey Manzhulo and their assistants have discussed various alternatives through which imports could be increased. The Finnish shopping list has now been left for the Soviet side to study, for it is not always obvious that the desired products, for instance raw materials, are available without difficulty; a planned economy does not, at least in principle, produce for stockpiling.

A solution is being sought in any case on the basis agreed at a high level, in other words, that the level of trade will be preserved. Three-quarters of the exports already agreed for this year have been confirmed through trade agreements and the level of exports cannot remain much below the agreed level. There will be another opportunity for trade discussions in Moscow next week when Foreign Trade Minister Jermu Laine comes here in connection with a Finnish building exhibition.

SOVIET-FINNISH SEMINAR DELEGATIONS REJECT ARMS RACE

[TASS report: "Security in the Name of the Future"]

[Text] No to the arms race. Security for all means security for every individual. This innermost desire, to avert the threat of nuclear catastrophe, imbued the speeches of the participants in a Soviet-Finnish seminar on disarmament which ended in Moscow on 11 March.

A wide range of questions of cooperation between the two countries' peoples was examined. Special attention was devoted to a vitally important problem of the present day -- the relaxation of international tension. It was emphasized that the idea of creating an all-embracing system of international security, whose principal foundations were formulated at the 27th CPSU Congress, has elicited a tremendous response across the planet.

ANTI-WAR LEADERS SUE NETHERLANDS ON MISSILE PLANS

LD121800 Moscow TASS in English 1748 GMT 12 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow March 12 TASS -- TASS commentator Lev Aksyonov writes: The hearing on the lawsuit brought against the Netherlands' state by 19,548 participants in the anti-war movement started in The Hague. They demand a legislative ban on the deployment in the Netherlands of 48 U.S. cruise missiles that are to be installed there before the end of 1988.

The question of the implementation of NATO's so-called "dual decision" adopted in December 1979 affects not the Netherlands alone. Inundating the territory of countries of the old world with its new nuclear missiles, the Pentagon has not enhanced the security of states of the region at all. Millions of citizens of Britain, FRG, Belgium, Italy, neighbouring countries arrive at the conclusion that the appearance of "Pershing" missiles, "nuclear death", in their countries inevitably turns them into hostages of Washington's nuclear policy.

Political parties, statesmen, scientists, trade union activists, clergymen, medics -- such is far from complete list of the forces participating in a powerful anti-war movement of Western Europe.

Social Democrats of the FRG demand that U.S. missiles be removed. In a statement circulated in Bonn, the presidium of the SDPG urged the FRG Government to declare immediately against the further deployment of those weapons in the country. British Labourites also hold a negative stand in the question of missile deployment. Labourites' leader Neil Kinnock stresses that a Labour government will set as one of its priority aims that of achieving withdrawal of U.S. missiles from the British Isles within a short period of time. He said the Labourites will demand that the USA remove these missiles in the same way as they were brought into Britain, and promptly.

Chairman of the Communist Party of Belgium Louis Van Geyt made a call to the Belgium Government to declare for an early achievement of an agreement on an end to the deployment and on subsequent removal of medium-range nuclear weapons. This would be the best answer of the government to the aspirations of broad circles of the peaceful Belgian public, he stressed.

Olof Palme, Sweden's prime minister, deputy president of the Socialist International, who died a tragic death, had devoted his entire life to the struggle for ridding Europe of armaments.

The Netherlands, which is not a large country, plays a remarkable role in the mass anti-war movement. Citizens of that country which has long-standing traditions of the struggle for peace have no wish to sacrifice their motherland to Washington's claims to "world supremacy". Suffice it to recall the unprecedented scope of the campaign against neutron weapons in the late seventies. As many as four million Dutch have signed the petition of protest against the implementation of NATO's nuclear missile plans.

Reflecting their opinion, leaders of anti-war organizations, who made the initiative for instituting the lawsuit, intend to compel the authorities to heed the voice of the masses. Precisely such developments would suit genuine interests of the security of the Netherlands, of entire Europe.

UK DEFENSE MINISTRY QUESTIONS U.S. 'CONSULTANTS'

LD122325 Moscow in English to Great Britain and Ireland 2000 GMT 12 Mar 86

[Commentary by Sergey Sayenko]

[Text] The British Ministry of Defense has asked for explanations from the Pentagon over the visit of a group of high-ranking so-called consultants from the United States to Britain, Sergey Sayenko comments:

Though the conservative government obediently supports all military undertakings of the United States this time it has had to cut short the trip of American consultants, led by Robinson, as infringing on Britain's sovereign rights. The move followed the disclosure of the visitors' purposes in Britain. They were supposed to screen British companies that are to take part in the star wars program and later to hand over their findings to a special department at the Pentagon, which according to the FINANCIAL TIMES is making an absolutely secret list of sensitive military technology.

It appears that the Pentagon would like to clamp a lid of secrecy on the research efforts of companies that are prepared to contribute to the SDI project. This would mean that Britain, just like any other country participating in the star wars program, would have to pay with its national sovereignty because the Pentagon would prohibit British companies to use the latest technology in nonmilitary production. Ultimately it is the British economy that would suffer.

THATCHER MEETING WITH AFGHAN REBEL CRITICIZED

[Text] London March 11 TASS -- TASS correspondent Aleksandr Yevstigneyev reports:

The visit to Britain by a certain Abdul Haq, one of the leaders of the Afghan counterrevolutionary scum, has been organised at the highest official level. The bandit, who is a guest of the British Foreign Office, was received by Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher today. The details of the meeting are kept secret. But according to the information of the London press, the widening of Britain's aid to Afghan counterrevolutionaries was discussed. The DAILY EXPRESS notes that the Conservative cabinet intends to increase this aid under the pretext of "humaneness". Going by everything, the British conservatives are unabashed by the fact that they show "humaneness" to cutthroats guilty of the death of hundreds of peaceful Afghans. The 5,000 counterrevolutionaries commanded by Abdul Haq committed a lot of crimes against the people of Democratic Afghanistan. The newspaper GUARDIAN writes that Abdul Haq and his henchmen were, specifically, the masterminds of an explosion in the Kabul airport in the summer of 1984, the explosion that killed dozens of passengers.

Abdul Haq's reception by Prime Minister Thatcher has become a sort of culmination of his "consultations" with representatives of the British cabinet. Thus, he held talks with Foreign Secretary Geoffrey Howe and with Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, Lady Young. According to a statement by the British Foreign Office, London expressed complete support for the Afghan counter-revolutionaries. It was noted that the British Government regards it quite acceptable to hold official contacts with representatives of Afghan counter-revolutionaries. It is recalled here that, as Margaret Thatcher admitted recently in a televised interview, Britain handed over four million sterling to so-called "Afghan refugees" in Pakistan in 1985 alone. It is precisely these funds that are used by "refugees" such as Abdul Haq to perpetrate violence and terror, against which the British Conservative cabinet declares so vigorously in words.

The decision of the Thatcher cabinet to invite the Afghan counter-revolutionary to Britain has been condemned by oppositional political parties of the country. The PRESS ASSOCIATION reports that a group of Labour MPs submitted to the House of Commons a petition which expresses profound concern over the fact that a counter-revolutionary who bears the responsibility for the death of people is a guest of the Foreign Office and of the prime minister. The Government of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan lodged official protests with the British Foreign Office over Abdul Haq's visit to London.

ITALIAN DELEGATION'S SDI TALKS IN U.S. NOTED

[Text] Washington March 12 TASS -- TASS correspondent Vladislav Legantsov reports: An official Italian delegation is currently staying in the USA at the invitation of the U.S. Administration to sound out Italy's possibilities to participate in the "star wars" programme.

The delegation is led by Mario Porta, vice chairman of the interdepartmental committee of the arms manufacturing industry. The delegation also includes representatives of the Ministries of Defence, of Foreign Affairs and of other governmental departments, as well as representatives of Italian private industrial and financial corporations. The members of the delegation have already held a series of meetings at the Pentagon, including with Lieutenant General James Abrahamson, director of the organization for the implementation of the "Strategic Defence Initiative" (SDI). At present the Italian guests are familiarising themselves with the activity of military and civilian organisations participating in the effort to implement the SDI programme.

The stay of the Italian delegation at the invitation of the U.S. Administration is a new step in the large-scale campaign of the Reagan administration to gear the American allies, above all, the allies in the aggressive NATO bloc, to the "star wars" programme. Italy is the third West European country after Britain and the FRG to have agreed under Washington's pressure to support the plans of the White House to create space strike weapons systems. As James Abrahamson has recently told newsmen, U.S. Administration's delegations visited practically all the NATO member countries in order to draw them in work within the SDI framework.

BULGARIAN OFFICIAL LINKS CIA TO PAPAL TRIAL LIES

LD112237 Moscow TASS in English 2039 GMT 11 Mar 86

[Text] Warsaw March 11 TASS -- Behind the "Bulgarian connection" in the attempted papal assassination trial one can clearly see the trace leading through Italian secret services to the CIA, Kostadin Lyutov, attorney-general of Bulgaria, said in an interview with PAP news agency.

The CIA's involvement in the fabrication of the "Bulgarian connection" is indisputable, he emphasized. One may have no doubts, however, that investigations into CIA provocations is a futile expectation. The Italian intelligence service, the Mafia and CIA extended services to each other on more than one occasion, the attorney-general said.

NOVOYE VREMYA ON 'PROPAGANDA' OF ANTONOV TRIAL

LD122309 Moscow TASS in English 1957 GMT 12 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow March 12 TASS -- More than nine months of court investigation, sometimes biased, and nearly forty tormenting months in custody is the price Sergei Antonov has been forced to pay. His plight vividly attests to the illusory nature of "human rights" in the West, the subject of so much talk by advocates of Western-style democracy and civil liberties, Eduard Kovalev writes in the NEW TIMES weekly, 11th issue.

The freedom, health and family life of an honest man, the peace of mind of his kin were sacrificed for the sake of mean political calculations. The "Antonov Case " shall for ever remain an example of a sleazy political provocation.

The pope attempted murder trial, staged allegedly for exposing the accomplices of the actual criminal, Ali Agca, who shot at Pope John Paul II, was deliberately led away by behind-the-scene forces and turned into a means of the large-scale political provocation against socialist countries, against detente in Europe.

Certain circles, Kovalev writes, have been seeking to "prove", come what may, the obviously false claim about "complicity" of Bulgarian nationals in the assassination attempt for nine months. The court was thus denied an opportunity to objectively reveal and expose the true accomplices Agca in all likelihood had.

An anti-Bulgarian, anti-Socialist campaign was launched around the assassination attempt on the pontiff's life and around the trial itself. Special services in the United States and several Western European countries, as well as professional misinformers on their payroll played a sinister part in working up the slanderous "Bulgarian connection" claim. The masterminds of the claim failed, however, despite all subterfuges. The attempts to break the will of the innocent Antonov failed, too. The position of the prosecution was finally undermined by the inevitable admission that Agca's anti-Bulgarian "testimony" was nothing but fiction.

The author notes in conclusion that it is up to jurors and judges, as Italian law goes, to give the final verdict. Only a few days are left before their ruling. Let us hope that the sense of justice and impartiality will prevail, and they will be able to remain free from the impact of the intrusive anti-communist, anti-socialist propaganda that for months described the horrors of "communist-controlled international terrorism", and sought to prove the "complicity" of Bulgarian citizens in the crime on St. Peter's Square. Let them return Sergei Antonov the freedom stolen from him, Kovalev writes.

[Text] Athens March 11 TASS -- TASS correspondent Anatoliy Tkachuk reports: An Athens court, trying Philip William Smith, former commander of the U.S. Ellenikon Air Force base in Greece, in absentia, has sentenced the man to 15 years in prison.

It was established during the trial that Smith had illegally arrested Yeoryios Alexandrou, leader of the trade union of workers employed at U.S. bases, who actively campaigned against U.S. military presence in Greece.

The court ruling was met with approval by the Greek public pressing for the removal of U.S. military facilities from this country.

LD101906 Moscow TASS in English 1839 GMT 10 Mar 86

[Text] Paris March 10 TASS -- The programme for the study of the Halley's Comet using the Soviet "Vega-1" and "Vega-2" unmanned probes has been successfully fulfilled. U.S. BEGINS 'PROVOCATIVE' EXERCISES OFF LIBYA

[TASS report: "Threat of Intervention"]

[Text] Tripoli, 11 Mar -- JANA news agency has reported that the aircraft carrier America and 10 other U.S. Navy warships have left the East coast of the United States for the Mediterranean. It is expected, the agency continues, that on 20 March, together with the other 30 U.S. ships deployed there, including the aircraft carriers Saratoga and Coral Sea, they will begin maneuvers off Libya's shores.

As is well known, this will be the third provocative show of strength this year by the Pentagon in the vicinity of the territorial waters of the Jamahiriyah aimed at intimidating the Libyan people and compelling the country's leadership to renounce its principled anti-imperialist course in the international arena.

LIBYAN TRADE FAIR CHIEF WELCOMES SOVIET 'SUPPORT"

PM121441 Moscow IZVESTIYA in Russian 12 Mar 86 Morning Edition p 4

[Report by APN correspondent E. Aslanyan: "Libya Is Not Alone"]

[Text] Tripoli -- An international industrial trade fair has opened in the capital of the Libyan Jamahiriyah. The Soviet Union is a traditional participant in it. This time our exhibition includes more than 700 exhibits.

Muhammad al-Qadi, general director of the Tripoli fair, spoke about its aims and tasks in an interview with APN's correspondent.

"Above all," Al-Qadi said, "we set the aim of familiarizing people with advanced technology and innovations in various sectors of industry and agriculture -- which will make it possible to take the experience of developed countries into account and to use it in the Libyan economy. In the Soviet pavilion, as always, there is a lot of interesting equipment -- which attests to the USSR's high level of economic development.

"Today the problem of peace is more acute than ever," Muhammad al-Qadi went on to say. "In my view, this was the most important topic discussed at the 27th CPSU Congress in Moscow. We in Libya followed the work of the congress attentively. The congress materials attest that the USSR will continue to advocate the development of friendly ties with liberated countries and will promote their economic and political independence and the development of their culture, education, and scientific and technical progress.

"Our plans for the future," al-Qadi said in conclusion, "can be understood from the Libyan exhibits. We intend to develop industry, agriculture, housing construction, and to improve the education and health care systems. For this we need peace and the support of friends."

GULF COUNTRIES CALL FOR END TO IRAN-IRAQ WAR

[Report by own correspondent V. Shevchenko: "Conference in Riyadh"]

[Text] Kuwait -- The continuing intensive armed clashes on the Iran-Iraq front are giving rise to serious concern in the Persian Gulf countries.

The need for the peaceful settlement of the conflict was emphasized at an extraordinary conference, held in Riyadh, of the foreign ministers of the member countries of the Gulf Cooperation Council [GCC], which includes Bahrain, Qatar, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Oman, and the United Arab Emirates. GCC General Secretary 'Abdallah Bisharah urged the international community to galvanize efforts to end the Iran-Iraq war. At the same time, the conference participants declared their determination to oppose any foreign military interference in the GCC member countries' affairs.

The breath of this Iran-Iraq war is being felt acutely in Kuwait because combat operations are taking place a few kilometers from the Kuwaiti border, protection of the country's sea and airspace has been strengthened; enhanced combat readiness has been introduced in the Army. Realizing that the continuation of this armed conflict would profit only those forces which would like to establish their control over the oil-rich and strategically important Persian Gulf region, the Kuwaiti Government has repeatedly appealed for an end to military operations and the speediest settlement of the conflict.

ALIYEV MEETS WITH SYRIAN PARTY OFFICIALS

[Text] Geydar Aliyev, a member of the Politburo of the CPSU Central Committee and first deputy chairman of the Council of Ministers of the USSR, had a meeting in the Kremlin on 7 March with the delegation of the Ba'th Party of Syria, who had attended the 27th CPSU Congress. The delegation includes A. Al-Ahmar, deputy general secretary, and S. Atari and V. Tannus, members of the party leadership.

The Syrian delegates said that they were taking home with them the brightest impressions of the work of the congress and its spirit of innovation and high exactingness. They stressed that the congress and the programme for the accelerated development of Soviet socialist society and the strategy of peace efforts charted by it were exceptionally important to the struggle of all the peoples against imperialism and the war danger, for the prevention of thermonuclear catastrophe, for international security, for national independence and progressive development.

A. Al-Ahmar said that the leadership of the Syrian Arab Republic attached fundamental importance to the further expansion of friendly Soviet-Syrian Relations.

The Soviet side expressed gratitude to the Ba'th leadership for sending a representative delegation to the 27th CPSU Congress and stressed the invariable line of the CPSU and the Soviet Government for broadening cooperation between the Soviet Union and Syria in different fields, between the CPSU and the Ba'th Party and between the Soviet and Syrian peoples. The meeting passed in a cordial atmosphere.

KUWAITI TIES SAID 'COOPERATION BETWEEN EQUALS'

LD112354 Moscow International Service in Arabic 1530 GMT 11 Mar 86

[Commentary by station observer Viktor Yuriyev: "The Soviet Union and Kuwait: An Example of Cooperation Between Equals"]

[Text] 11 March marks the 23d anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations between the Soviet Union and Kuwait. Soviet-Kuwaiti relations have developed successfully during those years on the basis of equality of rights, mutual respect for the interests of the two peoples, and the cause of guaranteeing international peace and security.

This fact is always pointed out by the two sides. The visit to the Soviet Union in November 1964 by Shaykh Jabir al-Ahmad al-Jabir al-Sabah who was then deputy prime minister and is at present the amir of Kuwait was an excellent incentive. As a result of this visit, in February 1965 an agreement on economic and technical cooperation was signed and in March 1967 an agreement on cultural cooperation was signed. In the following years several other agreements on cooperation were signed between the Soviet Union and Kuwait. During those years our countries have regularly exchanged visits at the level of ministers; deputy ministers; delegations of representatives of public circles', and men of science, culture and religion; as well as parliamentary delegations.

The successful development of Soviet-Kuwaiti relations is based on agreement of the standpoints on the struggle for strengthening international peace and security, and for the rights of all the peoples to free and independent development.

This is affirmed by the fact that the Kuwaiti leadership always supports Soviet peace initiatives in foreign policy and is evident to a great extent in Kuwait's reaction to the 25 January statement by General Secretary of the CPSU Central Committee Mikhail Gorbachev. As an example, the Kuwaiti press pointed out that Western propaganda cannot this time drown the Soviet initiative as long as the new Soviet proposals show a realistic way for the achievement of the common aim -- the establishment of peace and security in the whole world.

Kuwait also highly values the USSR's aid and support to the just causes of the Arab peoples and their struggle against the policy of the Israeli aggressors and their American protectors in order to achieve a durable and just peace in the Middle East. The Kuwaiti Government supported the Soviet proposal for an international conference in which the collective efforts of the concerned parties will be concentrated on achieving a comprehensive settlement in the region.

The Soviet Union, for its part, looks with full understanding at the efforts of Kuwait and the other GCC countries to turn the Gulf region into a region of peace and security, and for speeding up a political settlement of the Iran-Iraq conflict.

Our country firmly supports the inalienable right of Kuwait and the other countries of the region to manage their own resources freely and without foreign interference, and to guarantee the security of the Gulf region. It can be said with all confidence that this firm standpoint of the Soviet Union and the example of its cooperation on the basis of equality in rights with Kuwait contributed to a large extent to the establishment of diplomatic relations last fall between the Soviet Union and the Sultanate of Oman, and the United Arab Emirates.

The continuously expanding relations between the Soviet Union and Kuwait are opening new opportunities, and this good sign was strengthened last January when a high-level military delegation led by Army General Govorov visited Kuwait. Also, Minister of Oil and Industry Khalifah al-Sabah visited the Soviet Union, and during the Soviet-Kuwaiti talks, the two sides expressed mutual satisfaction with the development of relations between the two countries, and planned ways to extend and deepen them.

At the time of the celebration of the 23d anniversary of diplomatic relations, Soviet citizens express their conviction that cooperation on the basis of equal rights between the Soviet Union and Kuwait will continue in its fruitful development.

PALESTINE OFFICIAL SUPPORTS USSR MIDEAST PROPOSALS

LD072106 Moscow Domestic Service in Russian 1600 GMT 7 Mar 86

[Statement by Sulayman an-Najjab, member of the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of Palestine -- live or recorded]

[Excerpts] Many of you probably heard my speech at the congress. Once again I would like to draw your attention to the explosive situation in the Middle East. Washington attaches great importance to this region in its aggressive strategic alliance concluded with Israel and directed against national patriotic forces. The objective of this alliance is not to permit a just settlement of the Palestinian people's national problem and to subject the entire area to American military and political domination. In such circumstances the Communist Party of Palestine is resolutely defending our people's right to a motherland and the creation of an independent state. We fully support the Soviet proposals on settling the Middle East conflict, which is centered around the Palestinian problem. We also advocate the convening of an international conference on the Near East with the participation of all concerned parties including the PLO.

LEBANON'S JUMBLATT ON MIDDLE EAST ISSUES

LD112343 Moscow Television Service in Russian 1956 GMT 11 Mar 86

[Interview with Walid Jumblatt, chairman of the Progressive Socialist Party of Lebanon during the 27th CPSU Congress in Moscow; by commentator Farid Seyful-Mulyukov on "The World Today" program -- date not given; Jumblatt answers in Arabic with superimposed translation]

[Text] [Seyful-Mulyukov] During the work of the 27th CPSU Congress, I spoke with Walid Jumblatt, chairman of the Progressive Socialist Party of Lebanon.

The Political Report at the congress spoke about flashpoints of war danger and the need to activate the collective search for ways of settling conflict situations, in particular in the Middle East. Lebanon is now such a hot spot on the planet, and has been since 1975. What can you say about this?

[Jumblatt] Lebanon is part of the Middle East and when we speak about the Middle East then we constantly return to the Palestinian problem. I consider that until the Palestinian problem is resolved a just and lasting peace cannot be achieved in our region. Israel continues to occupy part of southern Lebanon. Recently it again stepped up its armed attack on the inhabitants of villages in southern Lebanon. Tel Aviv also continues to stir up the internal Lebanese crisis, working actively with right-wing extremist forces in our country.

However, we must look to the future and offer persistent opposition to the expansionist plans of Israel and try to achieve national agreement between the opposing groups in Lebanon. There exists a great danger of a division of Lebanon. This division could start in our country and end in the Persian Gulf.

We need to exert all efforts to end the senseless armed conflict between Iran and Iraq. All patriotic forces in the Arab world must unite their efforts for the future in order to prevent a deepening of our division. This division is sustained by the war in the Persian Gulf.

U.S., FRENCH INVOLVEMENT IN CHAD REPORTED

[TASS reports under the general heading "Chad: Expansion Continues"]

[Text] Algiers, 11 Mar -- The Reagan administration is clearly intent on using the Chad conflict to carry out its own expansionist schemes in Africa, the Algerian weekly REVOLUTION AFRICAINE writes. Following France, which began operation "Hawk," the code name for the armed invasion of Chad, the United States has also interfered in that African country's affairs by deciding to give large-scale military assistance to the Ndjamena regime.

U.S. Air Force planes are already supplying the Habre troops with weapons and equipment worth, it is estimated, a total of between $6 and 10 million, the weekly notes. The U.S. interference in Chad is not limited to military supplies. The Pentagon has begun vigorous intelligence activity in this part of Africa using its eavesdropping and spy satellite system.

Paris, 11 Mar -- The French troops stationed in Chad are ready at any moment to engage in combat operations if a threat emerges to the Hissein Habre regime's position, LE MONDE points out. Continuous communications are maintained between operation "Hawk" headquarters and Paris. The Elysee Palace, which has to give the order to go into battle should the need arise, receives minute-by-minute information on the development of the Chad situation, the newspaper writes.

According to a statement by a Transitional Government of National Unity [GUNT] spokesman in Paris, French troops have already taken part in fighting against GUNT forces in the region of the population centers of Oum Chalouba and Kalait using aircraft, tanks, and heavy guns.

ARTICLE DERIDES 'DE JURE' ENDING OF RSA EMERGENCY

PM101607 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 9 Mar 86 Second Edition p 7

[Article by Sergey Demidov: "Pretoria's 'Emergency' Trick"]

[Text] President of the Republic of South Africa (RSA) P. Botha and Minister of Law and Order (racist law and order) L. le Grange, to the publicity accompaniment of Pretoria propaganda, have signed a "proclamation" abolishing the state of emergency that the government introduced last July in many of the country's administrative regions.

The state of emergency was declared for the purpose of cruelly suppressing antiracist unrest. In accordance with this, police "security forces" and army subunits thrown into "pacifying" African ghettos were granted unlimited "rights" to bring terror and violence to participants in actions against apartheid. As a result, over the past 7 months approximately 800 more people have been killed in the RSA and 8,000 have been put behind bars.

During the last few days the South African potentates have repeatedly talked about an "improved situation" and a "lessening of tension" in the country due to the harsh repressive measures taken. It is precisely this that they use to explain their decision to abolish the state of emergency. However, this "goodwill" step by Pretoria is nothing more than an "emergency" trick. The state of emergency has only been lifted de jure. It is still de facto in effect.

It is no accident that, as Le Grange has announced, vital addenda will be introduced into the so-called "security laws" in the immediate future. After these "final touches," as is apparent from disclosures by certain highly placed racist cutthroats dressed in police uniform, these "laws" on lawlessness will become the new "mandate" for total violence in relation to those fighting to create a united, democratic society in the RSA. Even in the opinion of fugures from the "liberal" opposition Progressive Federal Party (white), the government thereby "intends to introduce an undeclared state of siege throughout the country's territory."

At the same time, Pretoria turns a blind eye to the murders of blacks perpetrated by certain "vigilante groups" which "rank and file" racists have formed at local level. These are basically semimilitary formations of white "volunteer" members of punitive groups. Under the slogan of "Defending white interests" they bring mob rule to bear on Africans.

The racist chiefs' maneuver has met with a positive response across the ocean. In Washington's corridors of power Pretoria's propagandist move was highly appreciated, and immediately loud noises were made about "moves" in the RSA in the direction of "democracy." In this connection African observers assume that the regime's trick was coordinated in advance with the American Administration. And this is no surprise. While protecting U.S. "vital interests" in the south of the African Continent, the White House remains loyal to its friendship with the racists, who have enthusiastically taken their place in the train of "neoglobalism" -- the doctrine of global international brigandage.

RSA democratic forces are not giving up the fight. Contrary to the racists' assurances, the national movement to eliminate the shameful system of racial oppression is not weakening. Pretoria's tricks can delude no one.

COMMENTARY DISCUSSES SOLUTION OF NAMIBIA ISSUE

MB071931 Moscow In Zulu to Southern Africa 1800 GMT 7 Mar 86

[(Yurgeney) Stipanov commentary]

[Text] In Geneva, on 6 March, talks were held between officials of the United States and the USSR on the problems of southern Africa. During these talks, the USSR noted the urgent need to resolve issues that cause friction among governments in the region and also called for the speedy resolution of the Namibian independence question.

(Yurgeney) Stipanov, commenting on these issues, says the solution to the Namibian independence issue includes two parts. First, imperialism must be eradicated from Africa. Second, there must be immediate action to diffuse the explosive situation in southern Africa.

The requirements for Namibian independence are well-documented in UN Security Council Resolution 435. What is essential is that South Africa's troops be withdrawn from Namibian territory and all armed combat cease, then internationally monitored free and fair elections should be held.

Resolution 435 was approved in 1978 but has as yet not been implemented. Why is that? The racist South African regime, supported by the U.S. Administration, has blocked the way of implementing the Security Council's resolution and until now there has been no way around this issue.

President Botha of South Africa recently told parliament in Cape Town that the Pretoria regime proposes that 1 August be set as the date for the start of the implementation of the Namibian independence plan, provided that Cuban troops have by then withdrawn from Angola. While on one hand it appears that naming a date for the withdrawal of South African troops from Namibia is imminent, it seems on another that there is yet much resistance from a group that seeks to keep Namibia under South African domination. President P.W. Botha's statements were, in fact, designed to cause an impasse. South Africa wishes to appear as a prime mover in resolving the problems of southern Africa peacefully and in the process shift the blame on Angola for any further delays to Namibian independence.

President Botha's statements have aroused widespread interest, but the international community's reaction is that South Africa is again employing more gimmicks to keep Namibia under its domination.

UN Secretary General Javier Perez de Cuellar has stated that South Africa's statements are unacceptable and that the Namibian independence issue should not be sidetracked from UN Security Council Resolution 435 provisions.

Washington has not escaped criticism on the Namibian issue. At the international conference on peace and security in southern Africa in Arusha, Tanzania, delegates noted that U.S. foreign policy on Africa is the one retarding Namibian independence.

SOVIET WOMEN, WINNIE MANDELA EXCHANGE GREETINGS

MB0810572 Moscow in Zulu to Southern Africa 1800 GMT 7 Mar 86

[Text] A TASS reporter has telephoned Mrs Winnie Mandela, an ardent antiapartheid activist, in South Africa. The reporter conveyed the greetings of Soviet women to Mrs Mandela on the occasion of the international women's solidarity day observed on 8 March.

In reply, Mrs Winnie Mandela thanked the Soviet women for their kind gesture. She pointed out that the achievements of Soviet women had clearly demonstrated what can be accomplished in a free society, devoid of capitalist exploitation. Once again, she thanked the Soviet women for their solidarity and support for the African women in South Africa, where racial oppression is still rampant. The women's leage in South Africa is an organization bent on destroying the illegal apartheid regime, Mrs Winnie Mandela concluded.

ECONOMIC AID CONTRACTS SIGNED WITH SEVERAL STATES

LD112315 Moscow TASS in English 2044 GMT 11 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow March 11 TASS -- The TASS economic and foreign trade service reports: The documents signed between the USSR and Guinea-Bissau in Moscow the other day on the development of trade and economic cooperation provide for the collaboration of organizations in the two countries in the construction of a number of economic projects in that African country, in particular, cooperation in building agricultural and power industry projects.

It is planned to build with the USSR's technical assistance another diesel power station in Guinea-Bissau to supply electricity to the city of Bissau, a TASS correspondent was told at the USSR State Committee for Foreign Economic Relations.

Earlier, several diesel power stations were built in the republic with the participation of Soviet organizations, in particular in Bissora, Farima and Caxeu. All of them are fitted out with equipment bearing the "made in the USSR" trade mark.

The Soviet "Technostrojexport" foreign trade assosication has signed a number of contracts with its Angolan partners for the supply to that country of building industry equipment and materials for use in transport construction, in particular in the construction of bridges. On top of that, it is planned to supply Soviet equipment for Angolan state building organization.

The Soviet Union is to supply Mozambique with machinery and equipment for coal industry projects. A contract to this effect has been signed between the Soviet "Tsvetmetpromexport" foreign trade association and Mozambican organizations. The equipment is intended for use in open strip coal mine [word indistinct] being built in Mozambique by organizations of the two countries.

Several contracts have been signed between the Soviet "Technostrojexport" association and its partners in the Seychelles. Under the contracts the USSR is to supply to that country, among other things, construction equipment, technology, materials, including cement and others.

Apart from that a contract has been signed, according to which a team of Soviet specialists in the field of construction and operation of construction industry equipment is to be sent to the Seychelles to give assistance to that country in the operation and effective use in construction of economic projects of various Soviet-made building equipment.

ANGOLAN TRADE UNION LEADER LAUDS SOVIET AID

PM121535 Moscow TRUD in Russian 11 Mar 86 p 3

[Interview with Pascoal Luvualu, member of the Politburo of the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA) and general secretary of the National Association of Angolan Workers, by S. Mushkaterov under the heading "Friendship and Solidarity" -- first paragraph is editorial introduction]

[Excerpts] The foreign guests at the 27th CPSU Congress included Pascoal Luvualu, member of the Politburo of the MPLA -- Party of Labor and general secretary of the National Association of Angolan Workers. TRUD correspondent S. Mushkaterov met him and asked him to answer a few questions.

[Mushkaterov] How do you evaluate Soviet-Angolan trade union relations?

[Luvualu] I dare to say that the very best relations have been established between our trade unions. They are relations of friendship and solidarity which are based on the principles of proletarian internationalism. Soviet worker organizations give the most multifaceted aid to the Angolan trade union movement and to our people as a whole. This relates to cadre training, and trade union cadres in particular, and also material assistance. Also of great significance for us is political and moral support. We were aware of this support earlier, when we were struggling against colonialism, and we are aware of it now that international reaction has taken up arms against us.

ANGOLA CHARGES U.S. INTRUSION IN DOMESTIC AFFAIRS

[Text] Luanda, March 9 TASS -- The Reagan administration is pursuing a policy of open interference in the home affairs of the People's Republic of Angola, says the statement issued here by the Angolan Government. Washington has ultimately thrown away all norms of morality and international law and is increasing aid to the terrorist UNITA gangs. Thus, the USA is demonstrating its intention to preserve the dangerous seat of tensions in southern Africa.

The United States, which openly banks on UNITA, stresses the document shares responsibility for the crimes perpetrated by bandits against the Angolan people. Assistance by UNITA is at the same time also assistance to the Pretoria racists, who are doing their utmost to destabilise the situation in the People's Republic of Angola, to protract decolonisation of Namibia. The Angolan Government considers inadmissible any aid to the RSA, U.A. member-country violating the rules and resolutions of that organisation, a country whose government is waging war against its own people and kindling tensions in the region. Under these conditions the Angolan Government declares that the Reagan administration, which gives planned and systematic support for the racist Pretoria regime, cannot be trusted and act as a go-between in resolving the problems of southern Africa. It is the U.N. secretary-general, who is to ensure the holding of talks on peace and security in the region and on the granting of independence to Namibia.

The statement categorically refutes "new proposals on Namibia" by South African President Pieter Botha, who was again trying to link the granting of independence to that territory withdrawing Cuban troops from the People's Republic of Angola. The presence of Cuban internationalists in Angola, the statement stresses, has nothing to do with decolonisation of Namibia. They arrived here in accordance with the agreement between the governments of the People's Republic of Angola and Cuba for aid to Angola in defence against a racist aggression. These troops threaten neither the Republic of South Africa nor other countries.

The Angolan Government, the statement says, reiterates its preparedness to search for ways for a just and long-term settlement of the problems of Southern Africa. The Angolan people wishes peace, and is convinced that the situation in the region cannot be settled through military and political diktat.

REPORTAGE ON SUPREME SOVIET DELEGATION'S VISIT

Departs Moscow

PM121432 Moscow IZVESTIYA in Russian 12 Mar 86 Morning Edition p 4

[TASS report under the general heading: "Official Reports"]

[Text] A USSR Supreme Soviet delegation headed byY.Ya. Vagris, deputy chairman of the USSR Supreme Soviet Presidium, left Moscow for Ecuador on 10 March, on an official visit at the invitation of Ecuador's national congress. Meetings in Peru

LD121204 Moscow TASS in English 0902 GMT 12 Mar 86

[Text] Lima March 12 TASS -- A delegation of the USSR Supreme Soviet led by Jan Vagris, deputy president of the presidium of the USSR Supreme Soviet, en route to Ecuador and Venezuela, paid a visit to Luis Negreiros, president of the Chamber of Deputies of the Peruvian congress. Conversing with the delegation, Negreiros spoke highly of the resolutions of the 27th CPSU Congress. He noted the commonality of the positions of Peru and the Soviet Union in the struggle for peace, disarmament and the prevention of nuclear catastrophe and against the "star wars" plans. The president of the Chamber of Deputies voiced support for Mikhail Gorbachev's proposal on the establishment of a comprehensive international security system.

Negreiros noted particularly the importance of the Soviet Union's stand on the foreign indebtedness of the developing countries. As he put it, that stand testified to the Soviet people's solidarity with the peoples of those countries, in particular, in Latin America, in their just struggle for the settlement of the acute problem of foreign indebtedness.

GORBACHEV SENDS MESSAGE TO ARGENTINE ENVOY

[Text] Moscow March 12 TASS -- Eduard Shevardnadze, a member of the Politbureau of the CPSU Central Committee and minister of foreign affairs of the USSR, today received Federico Bravo, Argentina's ambassador to the USSR, and handed him a message from Mikhail Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, to the heads of state and government of six countries (Argentina, Greece, Indian, Mexico, Tanzania and Sweden). The message is a reply to the address the text of which was conveyed by the Argentine ambassador at their instructions to Mikhail Gorbachev on March 6.

COLOMBIAN PRESIDENT AGAINST U.S. AID TO CONTRAS

LD101323 Moscow TASS in English 1316 GMT 10 Mar 86

[Text] Washington March 10 TASS — Belisario Betancur, president of Colombia, one of the founders of the Contadora Group which seeks to settle the situation in Central America with the help of talks has described plans of the Reagan administration on granting gangs of the "contras" a 100-million-dollar "subsidy" as a mistake that will not lead to anything good. He stressed in an interview with THE WASHINGTON POST that the whole of Latin America did not like Reagan's intention. In his opinion, the U.S. should resume talks with the Nicaraguan Government and not try to overthrow it.

NICARAGUA'S ORTEGA ON U.S. 'IMMORAL' PROPAGANDA

LD131009 Moscow TASS in English 0900 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] Managua March 13 TASS — President Daniel Ortega of Nicaragua has described as illegal and immoral the propaganda campaign launched by the Reagan administration in a bid to secure new multi-million dollars allocations for the dirty war against the Nicaraguan people. Addressing a press conference in Managua after talks with Robert Carpio, vice-president of Guatemala, Ortega vigorously denounced the debates under way in the U.S. Congress on forms and methods of the further U.S. terrorist activity aimed at strangling the Nicaraguan revolution. The United States has no right whatsoever to decide the destiny of Nicaragua, Ortega pointed out.

BORGE ON U.S. 'AGGRESSIVE ACTIONS' IN NICARAGUA

LD071838 Moscow TASS in English 1651 GMT 7 Mar 86

[Text] Brasilia March 7 TASS — The U.S. Administration invents all kinds of falsehoods in order to justify its aggressive actions against Nicaragua in the eyes of the American people, Tomas Borge, minister of the interior of Nicaragua, prominent figure in the Sandinist government, has stated at a press conference here. Thus, President Reagan went to the length of saying that Nicaragua would soon become a "Soviet missile base" threatening the U.S.

The anti-Nicaraguan campaign fanned up in the U.S. is needed by the U.S. Administration for forcing the Congress to authorize the rendering of assistance to the "contras" amounting to 100 million dollars. Some high-ranking officials of the U.S. Administration started gross blackmail and the psychological conditioning of the Congress. All this shows once again that the present U.S. leaders do not want to recognize the right of the Nicaraguan people to self-determination and openly challenge world public opinion.

Tomas Borge urged to do one's utmost for preventing a direct U.S. military intervention in Nicaragua. International solidarity is a tangible factor in the struggle of the Nicaraguan people for independence, he added.

DE LA MADRID ON INCREASED U.S. PRESSURE IN MEXICO

LD130002 Moscow TASS in English 2215 GMT 12 Mar 86

[Text] Mexico City March 13 TASS — Throughout its history Mexico has been waging a hard struggle in defence of independence and sovereignty in the face of aggression from the north. The Mexicans have countered the U.S. strength by patriotism and by love of freedom. This has ensured the existence of the Mexican nation and helped to retain political and economic independence, stated President Miguel de la Madrid.

Addressing the members of the ruling Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) in the city of Tlascala, the head of state has emphasized that it is essential to enlist the efforts of all the patriotic forces to uphold national sovereignty in the present difficult-to-Mexico period when Washington's pressure on the country has increased immeasurably.

EL-SALVADOR'S HANDAL ON U.S. INTERFERENCE

LD012057 Moscow Domestic Service in Russian 1500 GMT 1 Mar 86

[Statement by Jorge Shafik Handal, secretary general of the Communist Party of El Salvador on the situation in El Salvador to an unidentified correspondent; date and place not given -- recorded in Spanish with superimposed Russian translation]

[Text] Interference of the United States affects all spheres of life and activities in El Salvador society, determining both foreign and home policies of the country and deciding the fate of thousands of Salvadoran people. I will cite some concrete facts. Since January 1981, the U.S. Government has rendered more than $2.5 billion worth of economic and military aid to the regime. There is an enormous number of U.S. advisers, who of late have been directly involved in hostilities against patriots. For example, a few days ago, two of these advisers, who were officers of the U.S. Army were killed in the Morazan Department. All state institutes and organizations of the country are constantly under the watchful eye of the CIA. The U.S. Embassy in El Salvador has personnel specially trained for that purpose and an enormous budget for staging subversive activities at its disposal. Naturally, this state of affairs gives rise to just anger of Salvadorans.

I feel obliged to note that a significant growth in the military aid to the regime is now taking place. Americans modernized the regime's Air Force by boosting its combat power and immediately used the new aircraft and helicopters in operations for pacifying the population. Washington, therefore, is attempting to use new methods in conducting an old policy, a policy of terror. It leads hundreds or even thousands of people to their death but still fails to achieve its purpose. On the contrary, the guerrilla movement expands tangibly every day.

As you know, successes of the patriotic forces forced the regime to come out for its first meeting with the patriotic movement in 1984. A threatening call was sent from Washington, however, and the puppet government severed the dialogue. We see no other way out in this situation short of strengthening the struggle. In 1981, only five departments of the country were involved in military activities of the patriots; now they are underway in 13 out of 14 departments. We still are, however, continuing to search for a political solution to the problem, and we are confident in the fact that no matter how long the struggle, it will be crowned with success.

UN ENVOY ASSAILS CHILEAN HUMAN RIGHTS VIOLATIONS

LD112336 Moscow TASS in English 2033 GMT 11 Mar 86

[Text] Geneva March 11 TASS -- The violation of human rights in Chile sparks concern of the world community, said D. Bykov, a representative of the U.S.S.R. Speaking at the 42nd session of the U.N. Human Rights Commission, he said that tens of thousands of Chileans had perished since the military coup was staged in that country in September 1973.

Politically-motivated assassinations, abduction of people, arbitrary arrests and torture are widely practiced in Chile, Bykov emphasized. Pinochet is kept in power due to all-round assistance on the part of Washington. The United States should withdraw support for the Chilean dictatorship. This is demanded by the public at large. The Chilean people should decide their destiny independently.

The General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council, the Commission on Human Rights and other U.N. bodies stand for putting a stop to repression and persecution in Chile and for immediate restoration of the rights and freedoms of the Chilean people, the Soviet representative said.

COMMUNIST JOURNAL VIEWS CHILE'S MILITARY SPENDING

LD121317 Moscow TASS in English 1017 GMT 12 Mar 86

[Text] Buenos Aires March 12 TASS -- During the past 12 years Chile has been topping the list of Latin America's heaviest spenders on the maintenance of the war machine and repressive agencies. This conclusion has been drawn by the journal PRINCIPIOS, the theoretical organ published by the Communist Party of Chile underground. According to the journal, the junta's spending for the purpose puts a heavy burden on the shoulders of the working people of Chile, whose foreign indebtedness is close to 23 billion dollars. The junta has spent for military purposes more than 5 billion dollars since 1973, when the Popular Unity government was overthrown in a bloody coup. This money, the jounal says, has enabled the dictator to unleash the harshest repression of the Chilean people in the history of the country.

Pinochet has used those funds not only to equip the Army with modern weapons but also to build an abominable police machine, a system of secret prisons and concentration camps, and also to persecute and assassinate opponents of the regime at home and abroad.

The journal believes that the militarist and repressive policy pursued by the undemocratic junta is only playing into the hands of the United States. U.S. imperialism has every reason to be pleased with Pinochet. The dictator is doing it an invaluable service by keeping the Chilean people under control and enabling American monopolies to plunder with impunity the economy of the country. In addition, it buys huge quantities of weaponry from the U.S. military-industrial complex.

PRAVDA Publishes 27th CPSU Congress Speeches

Ukraine's Lyashko

PM041704 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 4 Mar 86
Second Edition p 7

["Speech by A.P. Lyashko, Chairman of the Ukrainian SSR Council of Ministers" (PRAVDA headline) delivered at 3 March afternoon session of 27th CPSU Congress]

[Text] Esteemed comrade delegates! The atmosphere in which the work of our congress is proceeding is distinguished by a businesslike and creative mood and the Soviet people's mounting political and labor enthusiasm.

The Communists and working people of the Ukrainian SSR, as throughout the country, welcomed with unanimous approval and support the provisions and conclusions set out in the CPSU Central Committee Political Report delivered by Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev, general secretary of our party's Central Committee. On the basis of a critical analysis of the fundamentally new situation prevailing inside the country and in the world arena this document shows from profoundly party and class positions the historical need for the strategic course of Soviet society's accelerated socioeconomic development, which was elaborated by the April (1985) Plenum.

The congress directives, which are innovative in spirit, the goals it has set, which are truly revolutionary in nature and scope, and the ways and means to achieve them are illuminated by truly Leninist ideological integrity, Leninist principledness, and Leninist truth and are becoming the cause of every Soviet person; this constitutes their abiding importance and inspiring force. (applause)

The concept of acceleration comprehensively substantiated by the party finds concrete embodiment in the draft Basic Guidelines for the USSR's Economic and Social Development in the 12th 5-Year Plan and Through the Year 2000 which were the subject of a detailed report to the congress by Comrade N.I. Ryzhkov, chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers. The draft sets accurate reference points and defines the package of most important tasks which our party and people have to resolve in the next 15 years.

Fully in line with the Leninist nationalities policy, the harmonious development of all the union republics and an increase in the contribution made by each one of them to the country's integrated national economic complex are envisaged.

While fulfilling the plan targets in terms of important indicators like national income growth, social labor productivity growth, commissioning of fixed capital, housing construction, and others during the years of the 11th 5-Year Plan period, our republic allowed a deceleration and a lag behind the control figures in terms of coal extraction and the production of ferrous metals, construction materials, and several other types of output for whose increased production the Ukrainian SSR bears particular responsibility to the country in light of the prevailing division of labor.

The main cause of this situation lies in the fact that the sectors in question failed to take prompt measures for the renewal of the production apparatus. This had a particular effect on capacities in the mining and fuel industries, where conditions for the extraction of coal and of iron and manganese ore became considerably more complex.

Not so long ago, the ore deposits in the Krivoy Rog field were worked by open-cut mining practically at surface level, and now the seams are at a depth of 300 meters or more. Mine shafts in the Donbass are discovering new coal seams at a depth of 1,000-1,200 meters. All this has created complex technical and production problems which have remained unsolved for a long time, and both republic and union management organs are to blame for this.

In line with the CPSU Central Committee April and October Plenum directives, major measures for retooling the national economy have been planned in the republic for the 12th 5-Year Plan period. The task is to double or triple the pace of fixed capital renewal through the widespread introduction of the achievements of science and technology and through comprehensive mechanization and automation. In particular, with a view to consolidating the raw material base of metallurgical industry in the south and in CEMA countries, it is planned to build a powerful mining and enriching combine in the Krivoy Rog field with CEMA countries' participation.

At least 50 percent of capital investments earmarked for production construction will be channeled into reconstruction and modernization, and the figure will be even higher in some sectors. In ferrous metallurgy, for example, it is proposed that almost 75 percent of earmarked funds be used for this purpose. Never before have we experienced reconstruction on such a scale.

In order to carry out such a volume of work — and this is not simple under conditions when enterprises are continuing to operate and output plans are rising — it will be necessary to resolve most speedily, both from the planning and the organizational viewpoint, the questions of the utilization of already existing technical and material potential. How do we perceive this potential?

First. It is necessary to accelerate the incorporation in production of uninstalled equipment, most of which is modern. At the beginning of this year the republic's enterprises had on their hands equipment in this category worth over R2 billion, including above-norm equipment worth almost R900 million.

One of the reasons why these surpluses develop is the disproportion between capital investment funds allocated by ministries and the expenditure already incurred by enterprises to acquire equipment.

For example, the USSR Ministry of the Petroleum Industry, in coordination with the USSR Gosplan, ordered and received way back in 1978-1981 equipment worth a total of R166 million, including some imported equipment, for the second stage of the Belotserkovskiy motor vehicle tire plant. This important project was planned for commissioning in 1985.

Yet, despite the republic's insistent requests, the ministry allocated only one-third of the necessary capital investment in the 11th 5-Year Plan period, and no plan provision at all was made for the commissioning of the capacities. This happened even though the shortage of motor vehicle tires and industrial rubber products is acutely felt in the national economy, as Nikolay Ivanovich Ryzhkov said in his report. In particular, they are needed for fitting to the new "Don" combines.

Now, thanks to intervention by the CPSU Central Committee and the government, things have started moving again at the construction site. But the lag in utilizing the equipment will amount to 6-8 years. There are, unfortunately, quite a few similar examples.

I think that the USSR Gosplan, when finalizing the 12th 5-Year Plan, must especially examine in all sectors the question of ensuring capital investment funds primarily for projects whose equipment has either been already supplied or is in the process of being manufactured.

Second. In order to renew fixed capital it is necessary to considerably increase the production of equipment by machine-building plants. This has to be achieved primarily by boosting the shift index of the machine tool pool.

Large reserves are still to be found here. The shift index of metal processing equipment in the republic's machine building industry is at present only 1.4. It is planned to raise it to 1.6-1.8 during the 12th 5-Year Plan period, and to 2-2.5 for flexible production modules and systems.

This task has been quite correctly set in the draft Basic Guidelines. After all, most of our textile and knitwear factories are constantly working three shifts. And it is well known that they basically employ women — mothers and wives.

Yet enterprises under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Machine Building for Light and Food Industry and Household Appliances, which are called upon to engage in the retooling of light industry and employ mainly men, work only one or two shifts. I think that they will abandon this socially unjustified privilege and will increase the production of machines and spare parts that are so necessary. (applause)

It is very important to step up intersector production sharing in order to increase the workload of machine building capacities. There is enormous potential for increasing production of equipment by using this factor. It is on the basis of such production sharing that each year, with the consent of the Gosplan and the USSR Council of Ministers, the republic manufactures above-plan equipment for industry and agriculture worth R150-200 million. This equipment is produced by enterprises under the jurisdiction of various ministries, whose capacities are underemployed due to the lack of departmental coordination.

Meanwhile, deliveries among enterprises engaged in production sharing within the same sector are increasing without justification, even though this leads to transportation over longer distances and larger quantities of components or semimanufactures being in transit instead of at machine tools or assembly lines. Every year more than 500,000 metric tons of cast and forged intermediate products are shipped out of the republic, and an almost equal quantity is brought in from other parts of the country, frequently a long way away.

In our view, an important role can be played by the newly-established USSR Council of Ministers Bureau for Machine Building in the solution of questions concerning the setting up of rational intersector production sharing, the improved utilization of capacities in industrial centers and regions, and the creation of specialized enterprises for general machine building purposes.

Third. There must be a considerable stepping up of work to obtain additional material resources by saving these resources, improving technological processes, and bringing secondary raw materials into economic circulation.

Definite experience has been accumulated by the republic in this most important area of enhancing the efficiency of production, and it is well known that this experience has been approved by the CPSU Central Committee. The relative share of secondary resources in the total volume of resource consumption has reached 12 percent. Their utilization in the last 5 years resulted in the production of output worth R17 billion. But we are only at the beginning of the road here.

The task we have set for the 12th 5-Year Plan period is to save almost twice as much raw and other materials, fuel, and energy as in the previous 5-year plan period through the introduction of resource-saving technologies and stepped up struggle against losses. It is planned to commission 30 modern enterprises for the processing of secondary resources. Here we hope to receive further assistance and support from the USSR Gossnab.

In connection with the problem of utilizing secondary raw material resources, I would like to ask our scientists working in the materials technology sphere to look at the following question. At present, intensive work is underway everywhere to create new materials — polymers, metal-ceramic, composite, and other materials with special characteristics needed for application in the latest equipment. Meanwhile, the technology of the regeneration and recycling of these materials, once they have served their main purpose, is not always available. The diversity of these materials demands that institutes and laboratories develop at the creation stage technologies and methods for their further utilization.

It must also be emphasized in particular that the implementation of the reconstruction and modernization program will require changes in the organization of construction work management. We perceive the essence of these changes as meaning that certain types of reconstruction work involving the halting of production would be conducted at the time of technological intervals and overhaul work by the construction subdivisions of the actual enterprises, in other words by the in-house method.

Most of the republic's major plants either have already set up or are in the process of setting up such subdivisions. But they need plan-based assistance in obtaining the most necessary construction equipment and machinery to match the volume of work being carried out.

Major tasks have to be resolved in the agro-industrial complex. During the 11th 5-Year Plan period the republic found itself in arrears to the state in terms of the production and sale of grain and such important industrial crops as sugar beet and sunflowers.

An analysis of the work of front-ranking farms and components testifies that they produce stable harvest yields even in adverse weather conditions. As a rule, their leaders and specialists are people who are quick to respond to scientific suggestions and advanced experience and have managed to establish close businesslike ties with workers in scientific institutions, to accelerate the introduction of new crop varieties and advanced technologies, and to achieve on this basis high end results.

A study of the questions of integration between agricultural science and production shows that the work on introduction is the "bottleneck" in this important work.

In light of the well known CPSU Central Committee resolution on the Siberian Department of the V.I. Lenin All-Union Academy of Agricultural Sciences [VASKHNIL], the republic Council of Ministers examined the question of the state of affairs concerning the introduction of the achievements of science in production and mapped out ways to correct existing shortcomings.

But insofar as the task in question is the end goal of both farms and scientific institutions, we ask the leaders of VASKHNIL institutes to step up the work of their subdivisions on the introduction of scientific elaborations in field and stock unit work. It will not be long before this, together with the improved material and technical supplies for agricultural production, produces a positive effect on results and in boosting the efficiency of the entire agro-industrial complex.

Comrades! Congress delegates from the republic's party organizations, expressing the Ukrainian people's will, unanimously approve the draft Basic Guidelines for the USSR's Economic and Social Development and propose that they be approved.

Soviet Ukraine's working class, kolkhoz peasantry, and intelligentsia, closely rallied around the CPSU and its Leninist Central Committee, will make a fitting contribution to achieving the set goals and implementing the 27th CPSU Congress' majestic plans. (applause)

Academy of Sciences Official

PM051049 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 4 Mar 86 Second Edition pp 6-7

["Speech by Comrade K.V. Frolov, vice president of the USSR Academy of Sciences" (PRAVDA headline) delivered at 3 March morning session of 27th CPSU Congress]

[Text] Comrades! The report by Comrade Nikolay Ivanovich Ryzhkov, chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers, convincingly shows the scale of the tasks to be accomplished by the Soviet people and discloses the program of peace and creativity, and the program for our society's socioeconomic development.

A key role in fulfilling the task set by the party — to almost double the national income in the next 15 years — will be played by science and scientific and technical progress.

Never before has the role of science been so great and responsible. The prestige of Soviet science not only contributes to enhancing the international authority of our country and its economic might, but also demonstrates in practice the advantages of socialism as the most progressive social system.

In contemporary conditions the CPSU Central Committee devotes particular attention to the priority development of fundamental sciences, which play a leading role in the development of generalizing concepts and in the establishment of general laws and phenomena of the physical world.

The results of fundamental research must be embodied in the machine building complex as effectively as possible. This complex, as indicated in the report by Comrade Ryzhkov, plays a determining role in increasing the productivity and improving the quality of social labor.

Unfortunately, it must be admitted that the advanced positions of our science in the sphere of fundamental research are far from always put to effective use in practice. The service life and reliability of a number of machines and the degree of their automation do not correspond to contemporary requirements.

The reasons for this are primarily to be found in the absence of a precise system and flexibility of organizational mechanisms and structures, which would connect scientific and practical activity and ensure the effective mutual influence of science and practice.

A number of specific measures have recently been adopted, which are aimed at improving the mechanics of assimilating and utilizing scientific achievements. Of principled significance is the formation of intersector science and technology complexes. The USSR Academy of Sciences heads complexes in such advanced areas as personal computers, fiber optics, machine reliability, technological lasers, and biotechnology.

A particular feature of the work of these complexes lies in uniting leading academic and sector institutes, special design offices, and plants, with the participation of university departments. This is a new, more sophisticated form of organizing collective scientific work in common, special-purpose priority areas. Naturally, in the complexes' formative period of work, a number of new questions will arise and consequently it is essential that exceptional attention be paid to ensuring the precise organization of their work by the USSR Gosplan, the State Committee for Science and Technology, the industrial ministries, and, of course, the USSR Academy of Sciences and the USSR Ministry of Higher and Secondary Specialized Education.

Within the framework of the "Machine Reliability" complex, work will be done to improve the quality and increase the service life and reliability of machine building products. Models of speical sensors, testing units, and diagnostic apparatus and equipment developed by institutes of the USSR Academy of Sciences and sector scientific research institutes have already been selected. By virtue of their characteristics these native developments are not inferior to the best world models. They have passed industrial tests and will be assimilated in serial production at plants within the complex during the current 5-year period. This will make it possible to equip our largest machine building plants with the most up-to-date testing and diagnostic equipment, and, consequently, to help to improve the quality and increase the service life and reliability of manufactured equipment.

Tasks connected with creating new construction materials and strengthening technologies, which will ensure machines are protected against wear and tear and prolong their life cycle, will also be carried out within the framework of the complex.

With the aim of intensifying research in the machine building sphere, the USSR Academy of Sciences, with the participation of the union republics' academies of sciences and the Siberian branch, has developed an integrated program of fundamental research and has also expanded joint research with the machine building ministries in the most topical problems.

Today, when we speak of omissions in the past, we cannot fail to say that there has been an underestimation of the role played by technical sciences. A number of technical institutes have been removed from the Academy of Sciences. Some of them were repeatedly moved from one department to another and lost the fundamentality and perspective of their research and also gradually lost creative cadres.

At the same time, the network of prematurely developed sector research institutes has grown — institutes with no schools of science, no traditions, no good experimental base, and, naturally, no new results. This has done a certain amount of damage to scientific and technical progress.

Of course, we have fine sector institutes whose schools of science have formed over decades. For example, the Kurchatov Atomic Energy Institute, the N.Ye. Zhukovskiy Central Institute of Aerohydrodynamics, the All-Union Scientific Research, Planning, and Design Institute of Metallurgical Machinery, and a number of others. The USSR Academy of Sciences persistently and consistently works to give effective assistance to plant laboratories and to develop the technical side of research. A new Department for the Problems of Machine Building, Mechanics, and Control Processes is now being set up under the auspices of the USSR Academy of Sciences, as well as its science centers in the country's industrially developed regions. Recently formed institutes in Leningrad, Sverdlovsk, and Ufa have already begun work connected with topical problems of machine building.

It is characteristic that in order to accelerate the introduction of scientific research a number of these institutes' laboratories are organized directly at leading machine building plants.

Academic laboratories have been set up at the Moscow I.A. Likhachev automobile plant for automated planning systems and laser hardening processes (Academician Ye.P. Velikhov is the chief). This has made it possible to raise the level of design work and prolong the life of motor vehicles manufactured by the plant while reducing their consumption of materials.

Laboratories under the auspices of the USSR Academy of Sciences A.A. Blagonravov Mechnical Engineering Institute for the problems of robot technical system reliability have been organized at the "Krasnyy Proletariy" machine tool building plant. It is precisely thanks to joint work that an experimental industrial model of a fundamentally new type of robot based on the effect of resonance was created here before the congress in a short period of time. The drive mechanism's energy consumption is reduced 5-7 times, metal consumption is reduced by up to 30 percent by means of using compound materials, and its reliability is increased several times over.

Joint work is being successfully carried out at "Rostselmash" to ensure the reliability of the "Don-1500" combine.

Unfortunately, there are still not very many of these examples. The USSR Academy of Sciences must further develop direct contacts with industry with the aim of making more effective use of its scientific potential.

We also believe it expedient to hold a preliminary expert consultation in the problem councils of the Academy of Sciences when machine building ministries purchase new equipment abroad. Cases are well known where, as noted in the report, far from the latest equipment is purchased while our own major achievements are not assimilated by industry for years. For example, the serial production of advanced machines based on the vibration principle of operation and also of various types of highly productive equipment operating on wave principles is only slowly being implemented, although experimental models of this kind of equipment have been created, in particular, at the USSR Academy of Sciences Mechanical Engineering Institute, the "Mekhanobr" Institute, and others.

Effective methods of ultrasound processing of materials using self-adjusting control which have been discovered by Soviet scientists, as well as methods of obtaining superductility and eltroductility in metals, selective transfer phenomena, self-propagating high-temperature synthesis, and other technological processes have not yet found broad practical application in machine building sectors.

Not infrequent are cases of the West being ahead in utilizing the proposals and ideas of Soviet scientists. Effective measures were recently adopted on a number of these issues.

The work of the USSR Academy of Sciences in the new conditions, when it is essential to accelerate the process of making a theoretical idea a fact of our reality, is impossible without reequipping the experimental base of academic institutes and substantially developing special design offices and experimental production processes.

Science centers' software must also be improved. Industry, engineers, and designers have an urgent need of operative information on the latest scientific achievements in a form that is as convenient and accessible as possible for perception and practical application. We believe it is absolutely necessary to urgently begin publication of an encyclopedia on machine building which would reflect the very latest achievements of both native and world science in this sphere. We are already carrying out preparatory work. Science is still greatly in debt to industry generally in the question of compiling good reference aids.

Comrades! The USSR Academy of Sciences devotes great attention to international cooperation with foreign scientists and organizations, primarily within the framework of the socialist community. Responsible and specific tasks are incumbent upon the USSR Academy of Sciences connected with solving topical problems in priority areas of the Integrated Program for the Scientific and Technical Progress of CEMA Countries through the year 2000 and primarily in such areas as electronization, comprehensive automation, nuclear power, new technologies and materials, and biotechnology.

Increasing the integration of scientific and technical progress and production presupposes further interaction between the natural and technical sciences and social sciences. In this connection we consider it necessary to solve the problems of the social and ecological consequences of scientific and technical progress with particular responsibility, utilizing the principled advantages of socialism in this and combining them with the latest scientific achievements, in particular in those priority areas of the Integrated Program mentioned above. And the Academy of Sciences is conducting such work.

It is particularly topical when the question is of large science projects and engineering works which, to a greater or lesser degree, concern millions of people, cover vast territories, have an effect on nature, and have remote consequences not always in line with our expectations and prognoses.

Increasingly high demands are now made on the professional and general timing of the person interacting with equipment, on his culture, psychology, and awareness in connection with the development of new equipment and technology on the basis of microelectronics. Consequently, "investments in the individual" and in the sphere of education and culture are proving to be most effective.

Accelerating the country's socioeconomic development poses new tasks in cadre training. The USSR Academy of Sciences has an urgent need to replenish its ranks with talented young people and to have an influx of fresh forces.

In connection with the reform under preparation to restructure higher education, we believe it necessary to introduce technical VUZ students as early as possible to specific, responsible work and, from third grade onwards, to attach them directly to enterprises to carry out course and diploma projects connected with industrial tasks. With this aim, it is necessary to form a system of base organizations uniting advanced institutes of the USSR Academy of Sciences, industrial scientific research institutes, and the corresponding VUZ departments. Our experience of combining the efforts of the USSR Academy of Sciences Mechanical Engineering Institute and the Moscow Bauman Higher Technical School is having positive results.

We consider it important within industry itself to raise the scientific level of young specialists working there, who are essentially the bearers of scientific and technical progress. Unfortunately, industrial workers who defend dissertations on science papers are now more the exception than the rule.

We must also find every intelligble ways and means of revealing the romance of technical sciences and developing young technical creativity. The all-union "Knowledge" societies and the mass information media can give a great deal of assistance here.

Comrades! The congress material, reports, and speeches provide a really scientific analysis of the contemporary problems of our society's life. Showing particular concern with developing science, the party has set Soviet scientists new, responsible tasks corresponding to the significance and scale of the present crucial historical stage.

Soviet scientists fully understand the great responsibility placed upon them today and will spare no effort to justify the party's great trust and to implement the decisions of the 27th congress. (applause)

Ceausescu Speech

PM281208 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 28 Feb 86 Second Edition p 7

[Speech by RCP Secretary General Nicolae Ceausescu at the 27 February Moscow session of the 27th CPSU Congress]

[Text] Dear Comrade Gorbachev, dear comrades and friends,

I have the particular pleasure of extending — on behalf of the RCP, all our people, and myself personally — warm revolutionary greetings and best wishes to the 27th CPSU Congress delegates, all Soviet Communists, and the friendly Soviet peoples. (applause)

Comrade Gorbachev's report to the congress presents the outstanding successes scored by the Soviet working people in building developed socialism and at the same time makes a detailed critical analysis of certain past negative states of affairs in socialist construction. At the same time, the report outlines in detail the targets for the USSR's accelerated development in the 1986-90 5-year plan and up to the year 2000.

As close friends, we rejoice in the great achievements made in developing the economy, science, technology, and culture and generally raising Soviet people's living standards, and we wholeheartedly extend to the Soviet working people and Communists and all Soviet peoples warmest congratulations and wishes for new and greater successes in building developed socialism and communism. (applause)

I would like to take this opportunity to recall with great satisfaction our long-standing durable relations with old traditions in the history of our peoples and the long-standing cooperation between the RCP and CPSU. We express our determination to ensure that these relations develop further, to the benefit and in the interest of both countries and of the overall cause of socialism and peace. (applause)

Dear comrades, in the past 40 years of socialist construction, Romanian industry has increased by more than 100 times;

agriculture 4 times; and the national income 32 times. In the years of socialism, Romania has turned from a poorly developed agricultural country into a socialist industrial-agrarian country in the full swing of development. The Romanian people have now proceeded, with all their might, to implement the 13th RCP Congress decision and the 8th 5-Year Plan goals, which aim at attaining a new quality of the entire nation's work and life, ensuring Romania's passage to a new and higher stage of socioeconomic development, and implementing the party program to build the comprehensively developed socialist society and secure the country's progress toward communism (applause)

We lay particular emphasis on intensively developing production, utilizing material and human resources with maximum efficiency, substantially increasing productivity, and raising the quality and technical level of production. We pay particular attention to carrying out the new scientific-technical revolution and promoting the latest scientific-technical achievements in all fields of activity. In this respect, we constantly concern ourselves with further developing science, education, and culture, as basic elements of building the new society. We work to continuously increase the party's leading role, improve relations of production and social relations, and perfect the management and organization of society. We firmly apply the principles of the new economic-financial mechanism and workers self-management and self-administration in all fields of socioeconomic life. We steadily concern ourselves with developing and improving the revolutionary workers democracy and strengthening the role of working people's councils and general meetings, as democratic leadership bodies of the owners, producers, and end-users in enterprises and institutions.

Proceeding from the revolutionary thesis according to which socialism is being built with the people and for the people, we have created a broad framework for the direct participation of the working people in running the entire socioeconomic life of society and formulating and implementing the party-state policy. We show particular concern for further strengthening and developing the state and cooperative socialist ownership, as a basic element of successfully building the new society and raising the overall standard of living and civilization. We intensify the political- educational work to develop socialist awareness and fashion the new man of our society, who is a conscious builder of socialism and communism.

Everything we achieve in developing the national economy, science, and culture directly aims at increasing the material and cultural well-being of the entire nation, the supreme goal of the party policy, ensuring the overall progress of the entire society, further strengthening national independence and sovereignty, and ensuring the victory of socialism and communism in our fatherland. (applause)

Life clearly proves that socialism is being built in different ways, from one stage to another and from one country to another; however, the diversity of the roads to socialism does not reduce, on the contrary, it further enhances the strength and soundness of scientific socialism. Socialism is mankind's future. (applause)

In all our activity, we proceed from the fact that the results scored by each socialist country in its socioeconomic development makes a direct contribution to the overall cause of socialism, its greater strength and prestige in the world, and the cause of peace. The achievements of socialist countries, among which the Soviet Union occupies an outstanding place, clearly demonstrate that only socialism can offer mankind the way to promoting fast socioeconomic development, eliminating backwardness, and ensuring the well-being and independence of nations. (applause)

We believe that shortcomings and mistakes that were made in the past or are still manifest in socialist construction in no way diminish the importance of the great achievements along the way of building the new society. There is no way in which such shortcomings can throw doubt on the superiority of socialism; they represent violations of or deviations from the principles of scientific socialism. Therefore, while working for their elimination, we should do everything to continuously improve the organization and leadership of socialist construction, unswervingly implement the socialist principles of social ethics and equity, for the further development of democracy, which are decisive elements of building socialism and communism.

Dear comrades, the international situation continues to remain very serious and tense as a result of the arms race, particularly the nuclear arms race, and the imperialist policy of force and interference in the domestic affairs of other states. This leads to increasing the danger of a new world war, which would inevitably turn into a nuclear catastrophe and may result in the disappearance of conditions for the existence of life itself on our planet. Therefore, we believe that now the fundamental problem of mankind is to defend peace, stop the arms race, and proceed to concrete disarmament measures to eliminate nuclear weapons. We should do everything possible to defend the sacred right of nations and people to existence, a free and dignified life, and peace. (applause)

We welcome and fully support the Soviet Union's initiatives and proposals to reduce nuclear weapons by 50 percent, put an end to nuclear tests, and halt the militarization of outer space. We consider as very important the program proposed by the Soviet Union concerning the elimination of the entire arsenal of nuclear weapons by the end of the century, with the belief that no efforts should be spared to implement this program. The nations expect that the United States and its NATO allies should adopt a realistic attitude and, on the basis of proposals advanced by both sides, steps should be taken to conclude appropriate agreements with a view to eliminating the danger of a nuclear war and halting the militarization of outer space.

A military balance between the two sides should not be achieved by increasing military arsenals, but rather by reducing armaments to the lowest level. This is in accordance with the interests of peoples and all mankind.

At the same time, resolute steps should be taken to substantially reduce troops, conventional weapons, and military expenditures, renounce the use of force, and solve all contentious problems between states through negotiation alone. We must always bear in mind that all states' socioeconomic development programs can only be implemented under conditions of peace and by radically reducing military expenditures. It is absolutely necessary to intensify the united struggle of all peoples and advanced forces everywhere for a new trend in international life toward disarmament, detente, cooperation, and peace. We believe that everything should be done to successfully conclude the Stockholm conference devoted to strengthening trust and bringing about disarmament in Europe and the Vienna negotiations on reducing troops and armaments in the center of the continent, and to ensure that the Geneva disarmament conference yields positive results.

Romania firmly advocates and works to create a nuclear-free zone in the Balkans, without chemical weapons, and to extend such areas in northern and central Europe and other parts of the world. In its entire foreign policy, Romania pays particular attention to developing relations of friendship and cooperation with socialist countries, particularly the neighboring ones. In this framework, we attach great importance to strengthening cooperation and collaboration with the Soviet Union.

We have resolutely acted and continue to work to overcome differences between certain socialist countries. In this respect, we welcome the positive trend toward the normalization of the Soviet Union's relations with the PRC. We believe that the enhancement of cooperation and solidarity among socialist countries plays an important role in increasing the prestige of socialism and promoting peace and cooperation throughout the world. (applause)

Romania acts to implement the decisions adopted at the economic summit of CEMA member-countries and the comprehensive program for long-term scientific-technical cooperation until the year 2000, which should lead to the socioeconomic development of each country and to the fulfillment of plans adopted by the party congresses in the respective countries. Everything should be done to ensure that the relations of cooperation among CEMA member-countries should represent a model for a new kind of relations based on full equality and mutual advantage.

We also expand cooperation with all other socialist and developing countries, with all developed capitalist countries, and with all states in the world, regardless of social system. We firmly base our international relations on the principles of full equality, national independence and sovereignty, noninterference in domestic affairs, mutual advantage, and each nation's right to freely decide its destiny and development path, without any outside interference. It is necessary now, more than ever before, to intensify the struggle to eliminate underdevelopment — including the extremely high debt of developing countries, by cancelling or radically reducing their debt — and build a new international economic order.

The RCP attaches great importance to strengthening cooperation and solidarity with the communist and workers parties, proceeding from the need to ensure full equality, respect for each party's independence and right to freely decide its political line and revolutionary strategy, in accordance with concrete conditions prevailing in each country, and noninterference in the domestic affairs of other parties. Proceeding from the need to observe these principles, we must do everything to attain a new unity in the struggle for social progress, peace, and cooperation in the world. The unity of Communists is a prerequisite of the struggle for the victory of peace. (applause)

At the same time, our party develops broad relations with socialist and social-democratic parties, national liberation movements, and with democratic parties and forces everywhere, in the struggle for disarmament, security, peace, and independence. In conclusion, I would like to again wish the Communists and all Soviet working people full success in implementing the important decisions to be adopted by your congress for the development of socialist and communist construction in the Soviet Union and for the struggle for peace and international cooperation. (applause)

Long live friendship and cooperation between the RCP and CPSU, between the Socialist Republic of Romania and the USSR, and between our peoples. (applause)

May cooperation and solidarity among communist and workers parties and progressive revolutionary forces everywhere ceaselessly strengthen. May socialism and peace triumph throughout the world. (prolonged applause, all rise)

Cuba's Fidel Castro

PM271652 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 27 Feb 86
Second Edition p 7

["Speech by Comrade Fidel Ruz Castro, first secretary of the Communist Party of Cuba Central Committee and President of the Councils of State and Ministers of Cuba," (PRAVDA headline) delivered at 26 February morning session of 27th CPSU congress]

[Text] Dear Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev, dear delegates, esteemed guests:

I want to discharge the first duty of a guest, which is to be as brief as possible.

A desire for renewal and a powerful surge of Leninist spirit, enthusiasm, optimism, and hope are perceptible in the atmosphere of your 27th congress. We, who have come here from a very distant country, are aware that this is no ordinary congress, but a historic one. All the preparation for it, which has been permeated with a deeply critical approach and comprehensive analysis of the state of affairs, and Comrade Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev's brilliant and bold report tell us that however great the political, economic, social, and social successes have been and however enormous the glory gained in the struggle to free your fatherland and the heroic feats of the Soviet people and its militant communist vanguard, nothing will ever quench your irrepressible desire to scale new heights along the path which was opened up by the Great October Revolution. (applause) This is in accord not only with the dictates of human nature but with objective historical necessity.

It is not for us guests to provide an assessment of what your beautiful, heroic country has done. Nor is it up to us to suggest what can or must be done. We can only express yet again our deep admiration and firm confidence that this people and its party will be able to overcome any difficult and rise to any challenge on the unexplored path of building communism. (applause)

The threat to the cause of peace, the danger of a war that could put an end to the human race and its most noble dreams, is perhaps the greatest challenge today. Mankind's history abounds in irresponsible acts leading to catastrophic wars. Now, however, for the very first time in man's existence, we would not be able to survive their consequences. And yet, despite this, the irresponsible policy of imperialism — the most blind, obsessive, and dangerous reactionary force ever to exist in history — continues, since in its actions it ignores, or tries to ignore the realities of the nuclear age.

We live in an age which demands nerves of steel, a crystal-clear policy, and granite-like firmness. Such are the nerves possessed by this heroic people, which has lived for decades surrounded by aggressive nuclear military bases. Such is its peace-loving policy. The Soviet people have demonstrated this since the time of Lenin, when weapons of mass destruction did not yet exist. And who can deny that the chief hope for mankind's survival lies precisely in their nerves of steel, unshakeable might, clear and firm peace policy, and radical and resolute proposal to end the arms race, ban space weapons, and eliminate all nuclear weapons once and for all. (applause)

Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev's statements on behalf of the Soviet people and their party prior to, during, and since Geneva should have left no one in any doubt that socialism is seeking peace and that socialism is synonymous with peace. (applause)

No less galvanizing in its significance is the course of speeding up the development of the economy on the basis of the consistent and rapid introduction of the achievements of science and technology, which shows us that the path of peaceful competition between socialism and capitalism is the only possible way of resolving the historical contradiction between the two social systems.

Upon these solid premises rest the great and justified hopes of progress and constant improvement of our political and social system, which is infinitely more rational and a thousand times more humane than capitalism. (applause)

These ideas, which the glorious CPSU has been particularly emphasizing recently, serve today as the combat banner for the whole socialist community and will without any doubt enjoy the broadest support of all progressive forces in the world. (applause)

Does imperialism really think that, in exchange for the policy of world peace which the socialist countries and all the peoples of the world are fighting for and which is an objective necessity for the developed capitalist states themselves, it will be allowed to arbitrarily decide the fate of the emergent peoples of Latin America, Africa, and Asia?

We, the peoples, will never allow the imperialists to impose on areas of the world local wars or "low-intensity" conflicts, as they cynically describe them in the light of their cowardly, opportunist concepts. (applause)

We do not owe our freedom to the charity or kindness of the imperialists. It is the result of our own struggle to attain and preserve it, and for it, blood was shed and the lives of our peoples' finests sons were sacrificed. Our right to it can never be taken away. Vietnam is an example of the price that imperialism can pay for the so-called "low-intensity" conflicts inflicted on progressive patriotic forces by the CIA and the U.S. Administration. This is also demonstrated by the struggle of the peoples of Nicaragua, El Salvador, Angola, Namibia, and South Africa, the Saharans, the Palestinians, the Afghans, and the Cambodians. There is the peoples' love of freedom.

Hunger, poverty, unemployment, backwardness in the sphere of education and health care, and, finally, the economic underdevelopment of the so-called Third World countries represents a further challenge to all progressive forces. It is on their shoulders that the severe burden of capitalism's economic crisis has fallen. Their foreign debt amounts to almost $1 trillion, and it is absolutely impossible either to pay or to recover it. The position of those countries has become desperate and morally and physically unbearable. Those peoples, who make up the vast majority of the world's population, unanimously demand the canceling of this unjust and absurd debt, which cannot be paid back, and a halt to inequitable exchange, dumping, protectionism, and looting of natural and manpower resources. They demand an answer from the capitalist countries; otherwise, they will dictate their own solutions.

The sharp fall in oil prices in recent weeks as a result of imperialist maneuvers has pushed a large group of debtor countries in the underdeveloped world to the brink of a catastrophe which is already being experienced by the vast majority of them. A halt to payments and major social upheavals in many Third World countries will be the inevitable outcome of this situation in the near future. Their peoples are confident that the socialist community will show the maximum solidarity with their struggle for just economic demands. (applause)

Dear Soviet friends, comrade delegates, Comrade Gorbachev:

Please accept the most fraternal and cordial greeting on behalf of Cuba on the occasion of the historic 27th CPSU Congress. (applause) On you we pin our hopes, the hopes of Communists and revolutionaries, the hopes of a people which while being part of the socialist community, are also a member of the Third World.

We believe in Lenin's great motherland, we believe in the Soviet people, their glorious party, its leadership, and in you, Comrade Gorbachev. (prolonged applause) We believe in your new approaches, your dynamic style of work, and your indefatigable struggle for peace, Leninist principles, and communism. (applause) We have faith in you, comrades, and offer you our full support.

Long live socialism! (applause)

Long live internationalism! (applause)

Long live peace! (applause)

Thank you very much. (tumultuous, prolonged applause; all rise)

SRV's Le Duan

PM271710 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 27 Feb 86 Second Edition p 7

["Speech by Comrade Le Duan, General Secretary of the Communist Party of Vietnam" (PRAVDA headline) delievered at 26 February morning session of 27th CPSU Congress]

[Text] Esteemed Presidium members!

Esteemed comrade delegates!

The Communist Party of Vietnam [CPV] delegation fervently greets the 27th Congress of the CPSU — the party of the working class and all the Soviet people and the vanguard of the international communist and workers movement. (applause)

Your congress is of truly historic significance. It marks a new turning point in the Soviet country's development and ushers in the stage of improving socialism and further confident progress along the path to communism.

This congress marks the comprehensive enhancement of the party's leading role in Soviet society's life and the consistent realization of the Leninist norms of party life.

The congress is an outstanding demonstration of the international cohesion of Communists throughout the world in their struggle for peace, national independence, and socialism.

Fighting under the banner of Marxism-Leninism and experiencing three revolutions, among which a special role belongs to the Great October Revolution, the CPSU is the acknowledged leader of a socialist power and the outstanding organizer of all the Soviet people's victories. The USSR's historic achievements in building the new society, the victory in the Great Patriotic War, confident progress toward the heights of the country's socioeconomic development, and the Soviet Union's constantly growing influence on all aspects of world development are all linked with the CPSU's activity.

The new edition of the CPSU Program and the party Central Committee's Political Report delivered by Comrade Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, are documents which generalize in depth the practical activity, tremendous achievements, and wealth of experience of the CPSU and vividly highlight the theoretical and practical questions of building developed socialism. These documents are of tremendous significance not only for the Soviet Union but also for all the socialist community, the entire international communist and workers movement, and all peoples of the world struggling for the transition from capitlaism to socialism.

Vietnamese Communists have taken to heart the lines from the CPSU Program which read: "Socialism is a society on whose banner are inscribed the words 'All for man, all for the good of man...' Socialism is a society whose thoughts and actions in the international arena are directed toward supporting the peoples' desire for independence and social progress and are dedicated to the main task of preserving and consolidating peace." They rate highly the CPSU's strategic course aimed at the planned and all-round improvement of socialism, the comprehensive intensification of production based on the acceleration of scientific and technical progress, and the fundamental reorganization of the structure of production and the entire management system in accordance with the requirements of mature socialist production relations and the dynamic development of the management mechanism.

The doubling of the production potential by the year 2000, coupled with its fundamental qualitative renewal, provides a secure basis for accelerating the growth of the Soviet people's prosperity, the all-around development of the individual, and the strengthening of the Soviet Union's economic and defense might.

The considerable strengthening of the potential of the Soviet Union and the other socialist community countries will undoubtedly promote a radical change in the world situation and give new impetus to the peoples' struggle for peace, independence, democracy, and socialism. Now more than ever mankind is becoming aware of its responsibility for the preservation of world peace. With increasing determination the peoples are striving for the right to be masters of their own destiny. Progress toward socialism is an objective trend of the modern era. Nothing can stop the forward movement of the three revolutionary currents.

None of us can underestimate the intrigues and treacherous plans of the imperialist forces headed by U.S. imperialism. They are scheming to plunge mankind into the horrors of nuclear war. But these are vain attempts on the part of a socioeconomic system which has already been condemned by history and is at a stage of crisis. The most bellicose imperialist detachments have suffered defeat after defeat in the aggression launched by them against the Soviet Union, Vietnam, and many other peoples of the world. Now, too, the forces capable of staying imperialism's criminal hand are growing mightier day by day.

By implementing the CPSU Program the Soviet Union will undoubtedly raise to an unprecedented level its role as the bulwark of peace, national independence, and socialism. The Communist Party and the people of Vietnam resolutely and consistently support the comprehensive program for the complete and gradual elimination of nuclear weapons and the great peace initiative set out in Comrade M.S. Gorbachev's well known statement of 15 January this year.

The implementation of this program will enable mankind to enter the 21st century with the hope of living in a world no longer threatened by deadly weapons, a world where war will cease to be a means of resolving disputes in relations between countries.

The world needs peace; every region on every continent and in every ocean needs peace. In the Asia-Pacific region, as in the Indian Ocean, the Soviet Union and Vietnam, united with other peace-loving and progressive forces, will undoubtedly frustrate the imperialist forces' attempts to sow armed conflict, will achieve peace and security here, and will ensure the peoples' real right to be masters of their own fate. The time has come in Southeast Asia to begin dialogue between the Indochinese states and ASEAN members to resolve the problems existing between them. In close unity with Laos and Cambodia, Vietnam consistently campaigns to achieve that. Southeast Asia must be transformed into a zone of peace, stability, friendship, and cooperation. (applause)

Comrades! Following the road of the October Revolution and under the leadership of the CPV, created and raised by President Ho Chi Minh, the Vietnamese people have traveled an extremely difficult and complex path, but one full of glorious victories. For almost 40 years our people fought and were victorious in the wars launched against Vietnam by the imperialist and expansionist forces. The great victory in the war against the United States waged for the motherland's salvation not only brought Vietnam independence and unity. It also gave impetus to the peoples' struggle for peace, national independence, democracy, and social progress. (applause)

For over 10 years now we have been building socialism on a countrywide scale, overcoming many difficulties of the transitional period and the grave consequences of the protracted war. The enemy uses every means to try to undermine the Vietnamese revolution's cause. However, we are effectively repulsing them, are constantly increasing our vigilance, and are ready to thwart all their schemes. We have sufficient spiritual and material strength to successfully carry out the two strategic tasks — building socialism and defending the motherland.

The new edition of the CPSU Program and the present congress inspire us to further progress. The fundamental line of the CPV and our state is the steady development of all-around Vietnamese-Soviet cooperation and the enhancement of its quality and effectiveness. The vital and long-term interests of our countries and the entire socialist community are effectively served by the consistent implementation of the Treaty on Friendship and Cooperation between the SRV and USSR and of the accords reached at the talks between the general secretaries of the two parties' Central Committees in June 1985, and by the joint implementation of the Comprehensive Program for the CEMA Countries' Scientific and Technical Progress.

Our party's upcoming sixth congress will define the tasks and socioeconomic indicators for the 1986-1990 5-year plan and at the same time will outline the basic guidelines for our country's progress toward this new stage of development on the path of socialist building. We will do our utmost to implement the three revolutions, in which the scientific and technical revolution holds the key place, before the end of the century and at an accelerated pace, to begin the realization of socialist collective management in practice, to create the new economy and the new man, and to guarantee the people a secure and happy life.

We would like to take advantage of this opportunity to convey the profound gratitude of the Communist Party and the Vietnamese people for the assistance, imbued with the spirit of socialist internationalism, which the Soviet Union has given and continues to give to our country.

Long live the glorious CPSU! (applause)

Long live the fraternal friendship, militant solidarity, and all-around cooperation between the communist parties and peoples of Vietnam and the Soviet Union! (applause)

Long live all-conquering Marxist-Leninist teaching! (applause)

Long live peace and socialism! (applause)

Thank you for your attention. (prolonged applause, all rise)

Party Organizations Face New Tasks After Congress

PM121125 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 11 Mar 86
First Edition p 1

[Editorial: "Communists' Program of Action"]

[Text] Soviet people are in a businesslike, animated mood. They are feeling the effect of the 27th CPSU Congress, which will go down in the biography of the Land of the Soviets as an historic landmark. The congress interpreted the present time broadly and in Leninist fashion. It positively appraised the course set by the CPSU Central Committee April (1985) Plenum which is aimed at accelerating the country's socioeconomic development. A realistic program of action for Communists and all workers, a program weighing up all aspects has been worked out. The congress decisions determine both the nature and the pace of our progress.

The Soviet people connect our achievements in building communism and our successes in the struggle for peace, which were discussed from the rostrum of the 27th CPSU Congress, inseparably with their own party. In the postcongress period the CPSU will be enriched by the collective wisdom of millions and will be more organized, cohesive, and combat-worthy. Implementation of the tenets contained in the new edition of the CPSU Program and the party statutes will contribute to further enhancing the CPSU's leading role and increasing its influence on all sectors.

The main task of party organizations and Communists is to convey to every Soviet individual the essence and spirit of the decisions adopted by the congress and to organize practical work to implement these decisions. What is most important now is to turn the energy of plans into the energy of concrete action.

The novelty, scale, and complexity of the tasks confronting us demand of Communists and all party organizations — from republic to primary level — persistent effort, single-mindedness, efficiency, and selflessness. A matter of paramount importance is to ensure a fundamental restructuring of party work and to establish everywhere an atmosphere of creativity, principle, and exactingness. We will not be able to progress a single step if we do not learn to work in the new way. And we will be unable to overcome stagnation and conservatism in any of their manifestations if we lose the courage to soberly evaluate the situation.

"The organizers of work to carry out the congress directives are the party committees from top to bottom," M.S. Gorbachev noted in his speech at the closing of the congress. "The style now needed is specificity, efficiency, consistency, unity of word and deed, the choice of the most effective methods and means, careful consideration of people's opinions, and skillful coordination of the actions of all social forces." One of the main conclusions of the congress is that all party committees must act as real organs of political leadership, not permitting any merging of functions, substitution, or petty tutelage over state and economic organs. The task has been set of completely overcoming inertia and the habit of submerging real, live matters in empty, endless logomachies around and about. We must decisively eradicate formalism and bureaucracy, cliches and indifference, attempts to "contrive reorganization," and groundless assurances and promises. Any breach between word and deed damages the authority of party policy and cannot be tolerated in any form. It is important that every Communist act professionally and to the best of his abilities in the sector with which he is entrusted.

The healthy, normal life of party organizations is inconceivable without strict observance of internal party democracy and the principle of collective leadership. This dictates the necessity to enhance the role of collective organs — party committee and bureau plenums and party meetings. The congress urged us to increase control and verification of fulfillment, develop criticism and self-criticism, and step up the struggle against ostentation and conceit. We must decisively curtail any attempts to suppress criticism or persecute those who criticize. Where exactingness is absent, party work becomes deformed and an atmosphere of complacency and immunity from punishment is created. This leads to stagnation in work and degeneration among working people. No organization in the party can be allowed to be beyond control or closed to criticism.

Any task can be set by man. We have a considerable number of good, talented leaders. Recently, many crucial sectors have been reinforced by energetic, mature, enterprising workers. It is the duty of party committees to continue to improve the selection, placement, and education of cadres. We cannot be reconciled to the practice — still encountered, but alien to us — of protectionism and of advancing workers through personal preference and local favoritism. There is only one criterion for all advancements and transfers: political and practical qualities, a worker's real achievements, and the ability to actively put the political line into practice. Ideological stability, strong moral beliefs, high political calibre, adherence to principle and competence, the ability to organize collective work, and a constant need to communicate with the masses and live people's interests and needs must be organically inherent in a leader.

A crucial role is played by primary party organizations in establishing a businesslike, creative style everywhere. These organizations operate at the very heart of the masses, where political decisions are translated into practical language. If a party organization lives a full life founded on principled relations, if Communists engage in specific tasks, success is assured. Party committees are expected to use every means at their disposal to increase the militancy of these links and to strive to ensure that there is a creative atmosphere in every organization, an atmosphere characterized by openness, publicity for plans and decisions, and mutual exactingness toward one another.

The Leninist idea of the need to enhance the title and significance of the CPSU member and of the importance of struggling for the party member's pure and honest image came across at the congress with new force. It was noted that in the last few years party ranks have been supplemented with fresh forces ready to selflessly serve the communist cause. Cases of reduced exactingness in the selection of new members are thereby all the more intolerable. Our task is to show tireless concern for the purity of party ranks, reliably protect the party against opportunists [sluchayhyye lyudi], and ensure that a personal example is set by party members. As is well known, there is no vanguard communist role in general terms — it is expressed in specific actions, practical deeds, and irreproachable execution of social duty. The congress recommended that more extensive use be made of the experience of party organizations in which Communists regularly give an account of their activities to their comrades and where party testimonials are discussed and approved at meetings. All this helps to strengthen the responsibility of all party members without exception. The political course adopted by the party creates favorable opportunites for considerably increasing the effectiveness of ideological work. However, serious shortcomings still remain in this sphere: a campaign-like approach, propaganda that is out of touch with life, underestimation of the severity of topical problems, and elements of scholasticism and alienation of theory from practice. Educational work must be brought into line with the realities of domestic and international life and its connection with organizational and economic activity ensured.

The congress considers education of the working people in the spirit of communist ideology and loyalty to the Soviet motherland, proletarian, socialist internationalism, an aware attitude to work and to public property, and irreconcilability toward everything alien to socialism to be the main guidelines in ideological work. The ideological integrity of the builders of communism is inseparable from honesty, conscientiousness, and probity. Communists are obliged to wage an offensive struggle against bourgeois ideology and morals, anti-Soviet provocations and ideological sabotage by imperialism, and against attempts to use religion for antisocialist purposes. It is essential to ensure an integrated approach to the matter of education, focus all work on the specific individual, and strive for unity of education in production, in academic institutions, and in places of residence. Those areas which ensure participation by all leaders in ideological work are the ones that are acting correctly.

An exceptionally important role in the implementation of the tasks outlined by the congress is played by the mass information and propaganda media. They are a powerful instrument of publicity and social control. The press, radio, and television are called upon to raise the level and increase the effectiveness of their items, not to avoid sensitive issues, and to raise for discussion the most topical problems, whose solution will help improve matters. This work is all the more fruitful, the more thought and energy is put into it.

The plans established by the 27th CPSU Congress are not commonplace, but daring. Soviet people are full of determination to fulfill everything planned. This is attested by the stream of letters and telegrams recently sent to the editor. Communists are at the forefront of the competition now developing. They are on the front line of creative work and set an example of selflessness and strict fulfillment of their duty to the people. In this lies the guarantee that the congress decisions will be successfully put into practice!

Purpose of New CPSU Statutes Explained to Press

PM111955 Moscow SOVETSKAYA ROSSIYA in Russian 12 Mar 86 First Edition

[TASS report: "Law of Party Life"]

[Text] The CPSU Statutes are the law of party life. The chief purpose of the amendments to the statutes approved by the congress is to bring their provisions into line with the new edition of the CPSU Program and the provisions of the CPSU Central Committee Political Report to the 27th CPSU Congress. This was pointed out 10 March at a Moscow press conference for Soviet and foreign journalists. It was devoted to the CPSU Statutes.

The press conference was addressed by I.A. Shvets, leader of the consultants group of the CPSU Central Committee Party Organizational Work Section. It was pointed out that the CPSU Program and Statutes are the documents on whose basis all of the party's activity is built. It is profoundly meaningful that they were adopted simultaneously at the congress. The amendments to the statutes are aimed at ensuring a further ideological and organizational strengthening of the party and higher standards of work in all of its echelons and, in the final analysis, at creating conditions for enhancing the party's leading role in Soviet society.

It is important that the statutes enshrine the immutability of the party's class nature and assert the unshakable nature of the Leninist principles of its organizational structure and its entire activity. These principles, on which our party's statutes are based, remain immutable and have been further developed and concretized with regard to the contemporary stage of the party's activity and the new stage of its development. The CPSU sees loyalty to Leninist principles and the consistent observance of the norms of party life as the decisive precondition for the success of its entire activity.

The amendments made to the statutes are designed to further deepen democratism in the party's internal life and in its work methods, to further strengthen the party's ties with the masses, and to enhance the responsibility of Communists and party organizations for the common cause.

Describing certain amendments to the statutes, the speaker noted a point of fundamental importance: In accordance with the Soviet Constitution, they characterize our party's role and place in the life of Soviet society more fully and reveal its international nature.

The question of party membership is a fundamental question of party building. The amendments made to the statutes enhance exactingness toward those entering the party and their responsibility for solving the tasks which the CPSU sets in the process of accelerating the country's socioeconomic development. Admissions to the party will be made, as a rule, at open party meetings with the participation of nonparty people. This practice has long been in existence and is now enshrined in the statutes. This attests to our party's profound democratism and to its desire to consult with the people and with nonparty people even in shaping its composition.

Substantial amendments have been made to the provisions relating to the party member's duties. They are aimed at raising the role and responsibility of Communists in solving tasks of the country's socioeconomic development, the intensification of production, and the acceleration of scientific and technical progress.

A significant proportion of the amendments made to the CPSU Statutes concerns the democratic principles of the party's organization and activity. The provision that democratic centralism is the guiding principle in the organizational structure of the party's whole life and activity has now been formulated more fully in the statutes. A number of amendments have been made with a view to further developing the democratic foundations of CPSU life. Above all, an entire series of amendments is aimed at strengthening still further the principle of collectivism in the work of all party organs.

A provision has been included in the statutes that collective leadership presupposes personal responsibility for the assigned task and constant monitoring of the activity of every party organization and every worker. This line of further developing collectivism in the work of the party, all its leading organs, and all party organizations is clearly taken in the Central Committee Political Report and the new edition of the CPSU Program. And it is enshrined in the statutes.

The primary party organizations, of which there are now more than 440,000, are the basis of the party. In accordance with the new tasks, the primary party organizations' basic functions and their duties have been formulated more fully in the statutes and defined more precisely in the spirit of the program requirements so as to direct them toward more actively solving the tasks of accelerating socioeconomic development and scientific and technical progress, intensifying production in every possible way, and developing socialist competition.

Amendments relating to the activity of local party organizations and their leading organs have been made to the statutes. They orient party organs toward constantly improving the style and methods of party work.

The section "The Party and State, Public Organizations" has been included in the CPSU Statutes approved by the 27th CPSU Congress. It formulates a principled provision regarding how the party builds its relationship with these organizations and leads them. It is emphasized that party leadership of mass organizations is political leadership and that all party organizations act within the framework of the USSR Constitution, not duplicating or supplanting other state and public organizations. The chief purpose of party leadership of these organizations is proclaimed, which is to promote the maximum development of their own activeness and to help every one of the state and public organizations to fulfill its functions in full.

The party attaches great significance to improving the activity of the Lenin Komsomol — its reserve and reliable helper. The policy of further developing the Komsomol's activeness in communist building, in educating young people, and in preparing the new generation is reflected more fully in the party statutes.

It was emphasized during the press conference that there is no vanguard role for a Communist in general terms; it is expressed in practical deeds. The Communist has one privilege: to be out in front and set an example in everything — in work and behavior. The statutes enshrine demands for party discipline that is the same for all Communists, which presupposes mutual exactingness, responsibility of cadres, indefatigable struggle for the party member's pure and honest makeup, and unity of word and deed.

Answers were also given to other questions from journalists.

Changes Further 'Democratism'

LD102033 Moscow Domestic Service in Russian 1600 GMT 10 Mar 86

[Text] A press conference for Soviet and foreign journalists was held in Moscow today. Igor Alekseyevich Shvets, head of the consultant group of the organizational party work department of the CPSU Central Committee, talks about the changes in the CPSU statute and the significance of these changes for the practical work of the party.

As you know, the CPSU Program and the CPSU Statutes are two foundation-laying documents, which the whole activity of our party is built on. What caused the introduction of changes in the party statutes? It was caused by the fact that it was necessary to bring the tenets of the statutes into line with the new edition of the party program. Such is the tradition of our party. Each time the party has adopted its new program, or a new edition of it, the corresponding party statute has changed.

Well, to talk about the main meaning of the changes: It consists of securing the further ideological and organizational strengthening of our party, raising the level of work in all its aspects, and finally, securing a further increase in the leading role of our party in Soviet society.

The changes introduced into the statutes are aimed, if we are to characterize them as a whole, at furthering democratism in the party's internal life, in its methods of work; at further consolidating the party's ties with the masses; and at increasing the responsibility of Communists, the party organizations, for the general cause. What are these changes aimed at, though? Well, above all, at further raising the standards applied to those who are entering the party's ranks, at raising the role of Communists in the vanguard, and at raising their responsibility for the solution of those tasks that the party is now putting forward in the process of perfecting socialism and gradually proceeding toward communism. A procedure is being introduced, whereby admittance into the party will, as a rule, take place at open party meetings with the participation of people who are not party members. Furthermore, all young people up to and including 25 years of age will enter the party exclusively through the Komsomol.

The third point is that each Communist who has committed one offense or another must be answerable, above all, to his comrades in the party organization. Paragraph 12 of the statutes has been drawn up anew; it has been drawn up in the spirit of the Leninist principle which is that a Communist who has violated Soviet laws must carry a dual responsibility — before the state and before the party. A whole set of changes are aimed at strengthening the collective principle even more in the work of all party organizations and all party bodies.

Now the party Central Committee is setting the task of using the party statutes to the maximum extent — we have calculated that, all in all, about 150 amendments have been introduced into it, or thereabouts — in order to activate the work of the front-ranking party organizations, to perfect its style, and to increase the role and responsibility of Communists.

Zagladin Views Social Justice, Party Criticism

AU111928 Prague TRIBUNA in Czech No 8 26 Feb 86 p 8

[Interview given by Vadim Valentinovich Zagladin, deputy head of a CPSU Central Committee department "to journalists from the socialist countries during the period of culminating preparations for the 27th CPSU Congress," "prepared" by Stefan Simak: "In a Period of Justified Hopes"]

[Excerpts][Question] The Novosibirsk professor Tatyana Zaslavskaya recently depicted the elimination of obstacles on the path toward genuine social justice as the best instrument for accelerating socioeconomic progress. Vadim Valentinovich, would you sign your name under that statement? Where do you see obstacles of a similar kind?

[Zagladin] Professor Zaslavskaya is right in many respects, because a more consistent implementation of the principles of social justice is a necessary prerequisite for a successful functioning of socialism as a social system. People react very sensitively when they perceive some violation of the principles of social justice. It embitters them and reduces their activity. Therefore, we must eliminate obstacles of this kind.

I will cite an example to clarify what I am talking about. There exist so-called unearned incomes. Take, for example, a rural community. The usual thing there is that people are working in a kolkhoz and earning according to the result of their work. But next to them live one or two families who do practically no work in the kolkhoz, but are selling on the market instead, making big money, earning more than their neighbors, because they are, in fact, selling for speculative prices. That, naturally, attracts the attention of others; they do not like it, it makes them bitter. Thus, one has to oppose that. Of course, not with administrative instruments — these are not of much help — economic instruments, stimuli, and the like should be employed here. In any case, it is necessary to tackle this problem.

We also see the same problem in the cities. There are people who are trying in various underhanded ways to make money. They work without any control — they organize various odd jobs for themselves as tradesmen and pay no state taxes. Thus, in essence, they engage in speculative activity. We can imagine that there are many such phenomena. I would not go as far as to claim that they reach some sort of catastrophic scale in our country — that is not the case — but these are facts that irritate people. We are now taking active measures to put an end to such things.

There is still another thing — the perfection of the system of remuneration for work done. For example, we see the violation of the principle of social justice — by the way, I spoke about this at a consultation of our party's Central Committee last summer. Let us say that a foreman in production is very busy. He carries a load of responsibility, but his wages do not correspond with that responsibility. They are lower than they should be. Therefore, people do not want to assume the function of a foreman; they prefer to stay on as workers because they earn more than foremen. This disproportion is being eliminated, the necessary measures have been adopted, and, as of this January, this system has begun to operate.

Thus, there exist certain concrete problems which do not stem from the system of socialism, but, on the contrary, they stem from deviations from this system. These deviations have come into being unchecked. Nobody has introduced them, but we must combat them consciously, which we are currently doing.

[Question] The precongress campaign was held in a spirit of very critical assessment of the past. Why precisely that approach?

[Zagladin] Because people want us to get ahead. The criticism that resounds is not meant to belittle what was done in the past. On the contrary, people are trying to carefully analyze everything that is good, less good, as well as what is downright bad, so as to arrive at conclusions by which they can abide in the future. The criticism has been oriented toward overcoming the existing obstacles and uncovering new reserves for advancement.

[Question] There is only a very deceptive boundary line between criticism and violent attack. Is there no danger that an unstoppable avalanche will begin to roll? Are people mature enough to approach these sensitive issues correctly?

[Zagladin] I dare say that the majority, the absolute majority of people are mature enough for such an approach. I even took part in meetings at which individuals tried to deliver demogogic speeches and had a go at assailing, but the rest of the participants immediately put them in their place. But these are really isolated cases. On the whole, the criticism now going on in the party is very constructive. People do not just criticize. I see a fundamental difference between criticism for the sake of criticism, which tries to show how clever the critic is, and criticism accompanied by constructive proposals, constructive ideas on how to improve matters, how to improve the situation. The substantial part of the criticism is precisely of that nature.

Vorotnikov Heads RSFSR Session on Labor Problems

PM121605 Moscow IZVESTIYA in Russian 12 Mar 86 Morning Edition p 2

[Report by unnamed special correspondent: "At the RSFSR Council of Ministers"]

[Text] At a routine session, the RSFSR Council of Ministers Presidium has examined a number of questions connected with accelerating the republic's socioeconomic development.

In particular, there was discussion of the question of the Amur Oblispolkom's work on creating the necessary conditions for accepting and establishing families which have expressed a desire to move to the oblast's kolkhozes and sovkhozes and take up permanent work there. It was pointed out during the discussion that the oblispolkom and local organs of the State Committee for Labor and Social Problems and the State Committee for the Agro-Industrial Complex make far from full use of the great potential which the state makes available to the oblast's kolkhozes and sovkhozes to create a stronger local food base and to receive and establish new manpower resources in an organized way.

The Presidium obliged the oblispolkom to eliminate shortcomings in the very near future and to make fuller amd more efficient use of additional benefits and material and technical resources. The RSFSR Gosplan, State Committee for the Agro-Industrial Complex, and State Committee for Labor and Social Problems and local soviets are entrusted with taking additional measures to place resettled people in employment, to get them established, and to make better use of them.

The Presidium session also examined the question of serious shortcomings in Volgograd Oblispolkom's work on increasing the production of local construction materials.

The session was chaired by V.I. Vorotnikov, member of the CPSU Central Committee Politburo and chairman of the RSFSR Council of Ministers.

International Women's Day Commemorated

Central Committee Message

LD111535 Moscow Pravda in Russian 8 Mar 86
First Edition p 1

[Text] To Soviet women.

Dear women!

The CPSU Central Committee warmly and cordially congratulates you on International Women's Day, 8 March — the day of international solidarity for working women throughout the world!

It is one of the most radiant festive occasions of all the people, coinciding as it does with the advent of spring and the renewal of nature's vital forces. This year it is being celebrated immediately after a notable event in the life of our party and country. The 27th CPSU Congress has just terminated its work. Its decisions have defined the main targets for Soviet society's political, socioeconomic, and spiritual development and outlined an extensive program for accelerating our peaceful building. The party's efforts are aimed at ensuring the further prosperity of our socialist motherland and enhancement of working people's lives.

The implementation of congress decisions — decisions which are truly revolutionary in character and scale — depends on intense labor on the part of the entire people, every person, and, in no small way, on you, dear women, on your initiative, energy, and creative efforts. Lenin said it is only with the help of women, their thoughtfulness and consciousness, that it is possible to strengthen the building of the new society; those words are just as relevant today. The CPSU Central Committee is firmly confident that your skillful hands, inquisitive minds, solicitous care, and kind, responsive hearts will even more actively serve the cause of improving socialism. The glorious revolutionary, combat, and labor accomplishments of Soviet women at all stages of the history of the Communist Party and state guarantee this.

The role of Soviet women in the country's political life is growing. One in two soviet deputies is a woman. There are more than 5 million working women in the CPSU's ranks, 1,352 of whom were delegates to the 27th party congress. The Communist Party will continue to unswervingly pursue the line of further involving women in managing state affairs and in multifaceted social work.

We address mothers today with special warmth. Our motherland's future depends on how you raise your children. Bring up your sons and daughters as conscientious, honest, and hardworking citizens of the socialist fatherland! Cordial thanks to you for your tireless, noble work as mothers! The documents of the 27th CPSU Congress reflect growing party concern for women, for improving their working and living conditions, and for families with children. Protection of motherhood and childhood in our country is state policy and a moral law of socialist society.

Soviet women's struggle for peace and against the threat of nuclear war arouses deep gratitude. In strengthening ties with women of socialist countries and working women of all continents, you are actively helping to implement the CPSU's peace-loving foreign policy course — a course which underwent further development at the 27th party congress. The Soviet Union will be doing everything possible to prevent the tragedy of war recurring and to ensure that mothers and children always live under a peaceful sky. The new Soviet proposals to eliminate nuclear weapons over the next 15 years are directed to that end. This year, which has been declared International Peace Year by the United Nations, can be the beginning of the end of the senseless nuclear race.

Dear women! We wholeheartedly wish you and your families good health, great happiness, and prosperity! May your successes in labor, studies, and creation increase! May your children always be a source of joy to you!

Glory to Soviet women! Fervent greetings to the women of fraternal socialist countries! Long live the unity and solidarity of working women throughout the world! May our motherland — the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics — strengthen and flourish!

The CPSU Central Committee.

Biryukova Address

LD081543 Moscow Domestic Service in Russian
0545 GMT 8 Mar 86

[Radio address by Aleksandra Pavlovna Biryukova, CPSU Central Committee secretary and deputy chairman of the AUCCTU, on the "Today Is International Women's Day" program — live or recorded]

[Text] International Women's Day on 8 March has become one of the most joyful popular holidays in the Soviet Union, a symbol of spring, of happiness, of motherhood, and of the labor glory of remarkable women. This year's holiday is a special one. It is illuminated by the light of the ideas of the 27th CPSU Congress upon whose work the eyes, thoughts, and feelings of every Soviet person and all the working people of our planet and all of progressive humanity were fixed.

It has been my great good fortune and high responsibility to be a delegate at the party forum, which is destined to be a historic one, and to participate personally in the discussion and adoption of some of the most important theoretical and political documents. All of us delegates to the congress feel the exceptionally strong impression from, above all, the Political Report of the CPSU Central Committee delivered by Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee. From Marxist-Leninist positions, it gives an analysis of the domestic and foreign policy situation of the Soviet Union. With Bolshevik candor and frankness, it speaks of the difficulties and shortcomings we face and of ways and means to surmount them. It expresses the collective wisdom, the will, and the resolve of the party and the Soviet people to implement the course toward accelerating socioeconomic development in our society.

The party has faith in the talent and selflessness of Soviet women who are an immense social force for our people. Speaking of guarantees ensuring that the course toward acceleration is true and will be implemented, Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev stated: We are counting on the support of women. These words impart new strength and energy and evoke a wish to work with persistence and determination on the implementation of the innovative plans of the party. The 27th CPSU Congress also reaffirmed that socialism has liberated women from economic and social oppression and given them the same opportunities as men to work, receive education, and participate in public life.

Today the main sphere of activity for our women, as of all the Soviet people, is the economy. They produce a good half of the material and spiritual riches of the USSR, since over 51 percent of all employees are women. In the Kremlin recently, badges for laureates of state prizes for outstanding labor achievements were presented to a large group of kolkhoz workers, including 82 women. I would like to talk about a few of them. Zinaida Semenovna Ivanova personally participates in the implementation of the USSR's Energy Program. She is an oil and gas extraction operator in the Surguttransgaz production association in Tyumen Oblast. Fifteen years ago, she linked her life with the opening up of the underground storehouses in West Siberia. It was here that she found her vocation and became a highly qualified specialist.

Raisa Grigoriyevna Davidovich, weaver at the Liepaja 60th Anniversary of the Great October Socialist Revolution haberdashery combine, services 15 looms. This is twice the industry's norm. She fulfilled her 5-Year plan tasks in 2 years and 7 months. And the silk cloth that comes from her skillful hands is of a quality corresponding to the very highest contemporary demands.

Nataliya Vladimirova Gellert is one of the delegates from the Communists of the Kazakh SSR to the 27th congress. She is a tractor driver at the Amangeldy Sovkhoz in Tselinograd Oblast. Natasha was born and grew up in the family of a worker with many children. She has known the joy of the work of growing grain from the age of 16. For 17 years now she has been cultivating virgin land on a powerful Kirovets tractor. The youth link which Gellert leads has gone over to the autonomous system of organizing work and payments for it. This has allowed the standard of land husbandry to be raised, discipline to be strengthened, and labor productivity to be raised by 50 percent. She devotes much of her time to great public work. She is a deputy of the USSR Supreme Soviet. She is raising two children and is an part-time student at an agricultural institute.

Hero of Socialist Labor, milkmaid Mariya Arkhipovna Golubyeva from the (Katun) Sovkhoz was the first person in the history of Altay animal husbandry to obtain an average yield of over 6 metric tons of milk per cow and she looks after more than 50 of them. Mariya Arkhipovna is a really good, honest, and kind person, but she is intolerant of any mistake even the smallest. Her approach to life is an excellent example to the whole labor collective. Her party colleagues elected her as delegate to the 27th CPSU Congress.

I have cited only four of the multitude of examples, but they convincingly show what it means to the Soviet woman that the right to work is one of the greatest of all rights.

It is not just a case of earnings. In work is a woman's pride and good name, the economic basis of her equal position in society and the family. Most importantly, in work woman senses her significance as an individual, as a citizen of her great motherland.

In the years of Soviet power a completely new kind of woman has developed here: literate, independent, a sovereign mistress in the state, in production, in the family. Occupying a high position in society, Soviet women feel their personal involvement in all that goes on and have a deep interest in ensuring that the fresh wind of beneficial changes should gather strength in all spheres of our life, that our movement forward should steadily accelerate. We were able to repeatedly satisfy ourselves on this fact, listening to the speeches by women delegates to the party's 27th congress.

Women of various professions, nationalities, and ages spoke. Each one of their speeches was marked by ideological conviction and tremendous yardsticks for life [ogromnye zhiznennye merki], culture, and comprehensive knowledge, profound understanding of their duties as party members and citizens. Supporting in every way and developing the creative activity of Soviet women, the CPSU steadily pursues a policy of attracting them to direct participation in running state and public affairs. For instance, in the soviets of people's deputies, which are the political basis of the USSR and the main element in the people's socialist management, every second deputy is a woman. In the highest state organ, the USSR Supreme Soviet, there are 492 women, or 33 percent of the total number of elected representatives. In no other country of the world is there such a broad representation of women in parliament. For example, in the United States, a country whose rulers expatiate about human rights and democracy, there are only 23 women — or 4.5 percent — in Congress and in the upper chamber, the Senate, there are only 2.

At present, the party's ranks include over 5.3 million women. There are more and more in elected party bodies, among the members and candidate members of the CPSU Central Committee, Central Auditing Commission, kraykom, obkom, gorkom, raykom secretaries and in primary party organizations. The number of women is also constantly growing among delegates of party congresses: 1,352 women participated in the work of the 27th congress — that is the greatest number in the entire history of the CPSU.

Our women are passing through a great school of public activity in the ranks of the premier mass organization of the working people, the professional unions. The growing participation by women in managing government and public affairs, their high political and public activity, are one of the features of socialist democracy. A woman may be a public figure, a weaver or a scientist, a tractor driver or a physician, a teacher, but she has a lofty and fine mission — to be a mother. The Soviet people profoundly honor the woman as mother. I, like apparently all women, was particularly agitated by that section of the CPSU Central Committee's Political Report to the 27th congress which spoke about the problems of consolidating the family, the necessity of increasing concern about newlyweds, and the further improvement of the situation of the woman as worker and mother. Having declared motherhood as a social function of woman, our state tirelessly cares about the mother and child, lightening domestic chores and satisfying more fully the spiritual needs of the female worker. At every new stage of socialist construction, with every new 5-year plan, this care is growing, is encompassing an ever larger circle of problems, and is occupying a substantial place in the state's social programs.

Major steps were made in this direction in the 11th 5-Year Plan, which coincided with the second half of the UN Women's Decade. Set measures were implemented to increase state aid to families with children. The 12th 5-Year Plan plans to make wider use of a partial working day or a reduced working week for women, and work at home. There will be an increase in the duration of paid leave for women who are mothers to look after children until they reach the age of 18 months, as well as in the number of remunerated days in the event of a child's sickness. Less well-to-do families will receive allowances for children up to the age of 12. The task is being set, in the coming years, to fully satisfy the population's requirement for children's preschool establishments. There will be further efforts on treatment for parents to include their children and holidays together. This year already, 211,000 people will restore their health in trade union sanatoriums for mothers with children on benefit and free terms. Over 1 million people will have a holiday in family holiday-homes and boardinghouses. Over 17 million schoolchildren will spend time at Pioneer camps which are organized for them by trade unions. There will be new family, all-union and local, tourist and excursion itineraries. All this responds to the spirit and the letter of the new edition of the CPSU Program adopted by the congress which emphasizes that at the center of the party's social policy there always has been, is, and will be care about people and their comprehensive development.

It is envisaged by the country's long-term plans to raise the people's well-being to a qualitatively new level. For example, it is proposed in the forthcoming 15-year period to double the volume of resources which will be directed toward improving living conditions and to increase real per capita income by 60-80 percent. Already in the 12th 5-Year Plan, the increase in incomes will affect millions of people. Huge funds are being directed at expanding housing and social-cultural construction. By the year 2000 practically every family will have its own separate flat and or its own individual house.

What lies ahead in the coming years is to secure higher production rates for consumer articles and to significantly improve the organization of trade, consumer services, and public catering. All this is extremely significant for women. Such are the plans. These plans will become a reality, it was noted at the congress, only on the provision that there is intensive and effective work from every Soviet person, every one of them, whatever the workplace, whatever the post.

The 27th CPSU Congress once again confirmed that the main aim of the party's foreign policy strategy is to secure for the Soviet people the opportunity to work and live in conditions of lasting peace and freedom. The efforts of the party and the state in the international arena are supported by Soviet women — as by the whole of the Soviet people — with work and with a conscientious and diligent attitude. They realize that their work achievements make a real contribution to consolidating peace and security and increasing the might of our motherland.

In conclusion, I would like to congratulate our remarkable women on 8 March. May you have happiness and peace, dear women, good health, family joys, and new creative successes.

Artists Evaluate Outlook for Cultural Scene

[Text] [Markov] The congress places very great tasks before the artistic intelligentsia. The criticism which has been heard in the report by Comrade Gorbachev and in the speeches by working class and other representatives is inspiring criticism which undoubtedly stimulates thought and will undoubtedly have the most profound consequences in the future.

It is clear that the question of redirecting efforts, of strengthening our life, strengthening creative activity will be posed to the full after the congress. I am convinced that there will be discussion by us, both in the writers' milieu and in other spheres of art. And we think we will respond to the party with an intensification of our work. We have both the strength and the opportunities for this. But, I would first of all like to announce to those taking part in the press conference one very important detail of our literature: its multilingual nature.

Contemporary literature today is written in 78 languages of the peoples and nationalities of the Land of the Soviets. In June, the eighth USSR writers congress will take place, the latest congress of the writers of the USSR. This is a major event and without doubt, the main ideas of the 27th party congress will be there as the main ideas on the development of the art of words. And, insofar as literature defines both the situation of our theater and cinema to a large extent, since it provides ideas and images from the outset, then you can imagine why such great attention is riveted on ths congress at this moment.

[Zamyatin]On to your question, please, Angelina Ospovna [Stepanova]

[Stepanova] I understand very well that the main role — besides the efficiency of the economy in the sense of its modernization and mechanization — is now the individual. Theater speaks about the individual and the theater is called upon to improve him, to make him, to inculcate the very best characteristics of the Soviet individual. Now, in order to show great thoughts and great feelings from the stage, it is necessary to possess them. For this reason, a part of the life of the party organization is the education of the individual, an individual of great thought, great feelings, who answers completely for his work, who is engrossed, inspired by his activity in art, and who gives everything of himself to his beloved work.

That, strictly speaking, is the program of our movement now of the art of theater: the individual, the individual in his best qualities.

[Ulyanov reads a question] In his day, Stanislavskiy expressed the thought that the theater brings peoples closer together. Please comment upon the topicality of these words for us today.

[Ulyanov continues] It seems to me that this issue is a very essential and important one, for the simple fact that we are living in a very small world. You all know this very well. Mutual relations are formed one way or another on the basis of what we know about each other. In this sense, the theater, as one of the most accurate expressions of the soul of peoples — even now, these days, the theater is the first to respond to the new currents in our life, in our reality. The theater expresses the soul of any people, whether it is the Guinean, the Russian, American, or German. Therefore, it is natural that when we arrive in one country or another and present one play or another, we are saying something about our own people.

Most regrettably, people are badly informed about each other — to speak frankly, about us in particular — or are informed in a biased way. I recently saw what, in my view, was a loathsome political and artistic — if it can be called artistic — piece of work: Rambo II. It is not possible to imagine such a great baiting of the Russian Soviet people as this film portrayed. I saw this in Mannheim, when young people were sitting in the auditorium and were screaming in frenzy against me. And this is produced by artists.

It is dishonorable to play this game. Here in our country there is no such film which would bait the U.S. people. We do have an argument of ideas between those in high places; this will continue and should take place. But you won't see a single film like Rambo against the U.S. people.

Yes, we want to say this about ourselves: In order to understand us, it is necessary to get to know us. For this reason, in that most important work, the struggle for the preservation of peace, it is necessary to know that both in Iran and in the Soviet Union, in America and in England there are people who want to live their lives in goodness and in happiness; the theater, art, artistes, and the cinema can speak about this.

[Unidentified moderator] A journalist from Britain asks for an explanation as to why little — from his point of view — attention has been paid at our party's congress to problems of the country's cultural life?

[Markov] I definitely cannot agree with the point of view that, in the Central Committee's Political Report, cultural problems have not been set forth enough, or not fully, or, moreover, unclearly. Incidentally, it occurs to me ask myself the following question: Where does such a notion originate from? I think I will not be mistaken if I say that such a notion originates precisely from the lack of familiarity with the whole sphere of our cultural life. Soviet art is fighting for diversity. It is only people who interpret our basic method, socialist realism, as a dry instruction, who may think that socialist realism is something like an enumeration of points. Our art is striving to represent life in a varied manner, to represent man in a varied manner, and to represent his personality — in its dialectical development and movement. Consequently, this can only be done with a diversity of artistic means.

[Petrov] The party considers that it is the business of the artists, writers, and musicians to look into our own economy, to determine what is bad, what is good, what direction to work in, and what manner. This once again confirms our party's position on the freedom of artistic creativity in our country.

[Moderator] Journalists are a meticulous breed and even when the subject matter is spiritual life, they ask for confirmation of what has been said with figures: How many people go to the theatre, how many go to libraries?

[Ulyanov] I am an actor and thus, naturally, I myself do not have any statistical data, but I will simply, as an example, tell you about the Vakhtangov Theater, which is situated not far from here on the Arbat, where I am employed. So, let's add it up together. Our theater seats 1,200 people. In the course of a season, we give approximately 450-460 performances and every evening we have a full house. That is the situation, in essence, of all Moscow and Leningrad theaters. I am the chairman of the central commission for cultural patronage work in the countryside; that is, our commission coordinates all the patronage work in the countryside throughout the country. So, I must tell you we have over 600 theaters; one play out of three in the country is put on in the countryside, one play out of three — naturally, metropolitan ones less so, provincial ones more — but what we get overall is that one play out of every three is put on in the countryside. Moreover, we are, for example, organizing so-called theater trains; that is, whole trainloads of collective farm workers arrive in the oblasts, in Novosibirsk, in Kursk, in Lipetsk, for plays. So, whatever else may be said about it, as regards the work of cultural figures on bringing culture to the heart of the people, there is quite a lot of that.

[Moderator] Now a correspondent from the FRG is asking a question which astonished not only those sitting in the presidium, but in the hall as well.

[Unidentified FRG correspondent in Russian] As I have understood it, there are no washstands in the Soviet Union and people wash in basins? And there are no combines, but pitchforks? So, my question is as follows: Is there such a tendency towards nostalgia in your painting and do you consider that this represents the real level of contemporary painting in the USSR?

[Moderator] The question was astonishing by virtue of how poorly our life and our culture are known. Comrade Tkachev, secretary of the board of the USSR Union of Artists, attempted to tell, inasmuch as this is possible in the framework of a press conference, what members of the union are working on today.

[Tkachev] Well, I must say at first — and maybe this will also serve as a sort of continuation of that conversation which was begun, so to speak, about the diversity of our art, our Soviet literary art. Well, the USSR Union of Artists constitutes one of the major detachments in our culture, uniting in its ranks over 20,000 members, including artists of over 80 different nationalities. Currently a number of major exhibitions are open in Moscow. These exhibitions characterize, really, the diversity of our Soviet multinational art and which, so to speak, presupposes the diversity of forms, styles, and creative individualities.

[Moderator] A UNITED PRESS INTERNATIONAL correspondent asks how, with such attention to the development of Soviet art, do people in the country look upon the loss of the directors Lyubimov and Tarkovskiy?

[Ulyanov] Lyubimov and Tarkovskiy. Lyubimov was an actor in the Vakhtangov Theater. He was a very good actor. Then he directed his celebrated production of "The Good Person of Szechuan" at college and the state entrusted him with a theater, out of which he made one of the most interesting theaters of the sixties and seventies. Then Lyubimov started traveling around the world a great deal, putting on plays. This you know. Nobody drove him out or forbade him to travel abroad, nobody forbade him to put on his plays. But, he lost to some degree a real sense of reality. And it's not just me saying that here at this press conference, I say it on behalf of the actors who knew him well and who had very good relations with him. He lost a real sense of life. He started dictating his conditions to the country. Such a thing has never gone on, and never will, in any country. This was his tragedy. That is what his son thinks, that is what the people who were near him think. But life goes on. Our country is huge, and the loss of an artist like Lyubimov is distressing, but not fatal, for our art.

The same thing happened with Tarkovskiy. It was their personal decision, it was their personal tragedy, not some kind of malicious intention of the country.

[Chakovskiy] A question from Moscow Radio. Do we think — in this case, do I think — that the theme of the heroism of the Soviet people in the war years must live on? How do artistic figures view this?

I believe that despite the simplicity, the apparent simplicity of the question, this is a very important question and I shall reply to it with pleasure and with all sincerity. Why has the war theme, the theme of the World War II, the fight against nazism, become so popular in the Soviet Union? Why is there such a huge demand for this theme among readers? We were victorious, of course, because of heroism, because of national patriotism, because of the bravery of Soviet soldiers and the skill of (?military) commanders, and because our level of armaments grew — all that is true. But none of our ill-wishers, when recalling the war, writes about the main reason why we won the war: We won it, apart from the reasons I have listed, because the Soviet people were devoted to the Soviet way of life and could not countenance any other way of life apart from our socialist one.

'Good' 2-Month Industrial Results; 'Laggards' Noted

[SOTSIALISTICHESKAYA INDUSTRIYA "Economics and Propaganda Section" report under the rubric "27th Congress: Power for Acceleration": "Consolidating and Developing Success"]

[Text] The results of industry's work during the first 2 months of the year have been summed up. The results are good: The sales plan was overfulfilled by 2 percent, being met by all union republics and industrial ministries except the Ministry of the Petroleum Industry.

High growth rates in the main indicators characterized the 2 months. Compared with January-February last year, total industrial output was up by 7.3 percent. This is 3 percent higher than envisaged in the annual plan. Labor productivity is also growing in excess of the plan: it grew by 6.9 percent, as against a planned increase of 4.1 percent. It accounted for 95 percent of the additional industrial output.

Improved fulfillment of output production plans in physical terms was an important achievement of the first 2 months. The most marked success was achieved by gas extraction workers. They extracted 2.4 billion cubic meters of fuel above target. Miners also worked well: 4.2 million tons of coal in excess of the plan were produced.

Workers in other industrial sectors also worked strenuously and responsibly during the last 2 months. Metallurgy workers met their production targets for basic kinds of metal products. Chemical industry workers produced the planned quantity of mineral fertilizers, synthetic resins, plastics, chemical fibers, and yarns. Although, it should be noted, there was a shortfall in soda ash, themoplastic pipes, and pipeline parts.

Machine builders worked steadily. They fulfilled the 2-month production programs and markedly increased the output of metal-cutting machine tools, vehicles, and tractors. Enterprises of the Ministry of the Electrical Equipment Industry, which did not fully meet their production plans for large-scale AC electric machines and electric motors, were among the laggards. The Ministry of Heavy and Transport Machine Building did not fully meet its production targets for mainline passenger railcars.

The success of workers in the timber and paper industry should be noted. They met the January-February plan for procurement of commercial timber and paper production.

Output of consumer goods is increasing. Many kinds of consumer goods are being produced in excess of the plan. This is also a positive trend of the first 2 months which must be consolidated in every way while at the same time paying greater attention to output quality. Combines of the USSR Ministry of Light Industry producing silk fabrics and some plants of the Ministry of the Radio Industry and the Ministry of the Electronics Industry which were behindhand in color television production are coping least well with the plan.

Today's requirement is to step up the pace and tighten plan discipline. The effectiveness of socialist competition will be judged by how well this is carried out.

Talyzin Chairs Management Panel; New Bodies Formed

PM111410 Moscow EKONOMICHESKAYA GAZETA in Russian No 11, Mar 86 (Signed to Press 6 Mar 86) p 31

[Unattributed report: "In the Commission for the Improvement of Management, Planning, and the Economic Mechanism"]

[Text] The latest session of the Commission for the Improvement of Management, Planning, and the Economic Mechanism, which was chaired by N.V. Talyzin, candidate member of the CPSU Central Committee Politburo, first deputy chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers, and chairman of the USSR Gosplan, examined the question of general sector management schemes. Instructions were issued to elaborate a draft standard structure of a sectorial ministry's central apparatus and to distribute it to the ministries.

Organizational measures and the procedure for preparing materials to be examined by the commission were discussed. A composite working group of the commission was formed for preliminary coordination of central economic departments' opinions, and its personnel structure was approved.

Subcommissions were formed for the improvement of management, planning, and the economic mechanism: in the construction industry complex; the agro-industrial complex; the machine-building complex; union republics, economic regions, krays, and oblasts; and for the development of labor resources. The leaders of subcommissions were appointed.

Working groups for the improvement of management, planning, and the economic mechanism in sectors of the national economy and industry (ministries and departments) were formed for the purpose of carrying out an analysis of sectorial problems concerning the improvement of management, planning, and the economic mechanism, preparing proposals for the conduct of economic experiments and recommendations for the improvement of forms and methods of management, and rendering methodological assistance to ministries during the transition to new conditions of economic management. The functions and powers of the USSR Gosplan Interdepartmental Commission for Questions of the Application of New Methods of Planning and Economic Incentives have been transferred to them.

It was deemed expedient to reorganize the union republic commissions for questions of management as commissions for the improvement of management, planning, and the economic mechanism (transferring to them the functions and powers of the interdepartmental commissions under union republic Gosplans on questions of the application of new methods of planning and economic incentives and commissions for the leadership of the economic experiment) and to form scientific sections under them.

A Scientific-Methodological Council and a Council for the Utilization of Management Experience Abroad were formed under the commission's Scientific Section.

Auto Export Trade Increases 10 Percent in 1985

LD041457 Moscow TASS in English 1330 GMT 4 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow, March 4 TASS — The trade turnover of the Soviet Foreign Trade Association "Avtoexport" went up by 10 per cent in 1985 to reach 3.6 billion roubles. The export of Soviet automobiles increased by 16 per cent as against 1984 and reached 1.4 billion roubles, "Avtoexport" reports.

Organizations and firms of socialist countries continued to be its main trade partners in 1985. They accounted for over 60 per cent of all the export deliveries and about 90 per cent of imports. City and interurban buses, accessories, as well as various automobile equipment for the needs of the national economy made up the bulk of the imports. Cars and trucks continued to be the main items of Soviet export. Reciprocal deliveries within the framework of specialization and cooperation programs of socialist countries accounted for a considerable part of trade turnover with those countries.

Trade with firms of industrially developed capitalist states, as well as developing countries, featured prominently in business relations of "Avtoexport" in 1985. "Lada" cars produced by the Volzhsky automobile works continued to make up the bulk of the export to capitalist countries. About 80 per cent of the aggregate number of the cars exported by the USSR in 1985 were delivered to Western Europe. Soviet trucks with diesel motors were delivered to some countries, for example, Greece.

Business relations of "Avtoexport" with organizations and firms of developing countries were further developed last year. With many of them trade relations on a barter basis are maintained. For instance, the Egyptian firm "Unimeg" received a consignment of cars in exchange for the deliveries to the USSR of volatile oils and perfumery goods. Over 1,800 "Lada" and "Vaz" cars were delivered to Turkey, Panama, Jamaica and Ecuador in exchange for traditional export commodities.

About 50,000 cars were sold on the markets of capitalist and developing countries by joint-stock companies with the participation of Soviet capital.

"Avtoexport" devoted much attention in 1985 to the renewal of its export program. For the first time ever "Maz" trucks of a new generation and "Vaz-2108-Samara" cars were exported.

In 1985 "Avtoexport" took part in international shows in Brussels and Geneva, as well as in a number of other international shows and exhibitions. It actively searched for new forms of cooperation with foreign partners. For example, agreements were signed with a number of Finnish firms on cooperation in the manufacturing of specialized ambulance cars and mobile TV stations mounted on the chassis of Soviet trucks. Negotiations were held with a number of firms from developing countries on the production of automobiles there according to Soviet licences.

Transcaucasus Nuclear Power Station — Work has started on the second section of a huge atomic power station going up in Armenia in the Transcaucasus. This power station, the first of its kind to go up in the Transcaucasus, has already demonstrated its high efficiency, reliability, and complete safety for the workers during the years it has operated. Large-Capacity Helicopter — Moscow, February 18 TASS — The world's biggest MI-26 helicopter has left for northern Siberia for operational tests at temperatures of minus 40 degrees celsius. The helicopter, with a lifting capacity of 20 tons, will carry cargo to oil and gas fields in Tyumen Region. The MI-26 was sent to Siberia because heavy-duty helicopters will be in high demand there in the current five-year period (1986-1990). The new helicopter is to replace the veterans MI-6 and MI-10 whose lifting capacity is half of that of the new machine. [Text][Moscow TASS in English 0947 GMT 18 Feb 86 LD]

Maritime Kray Industrial Power — A large 400-km power bridge in Maritime Kray has begun operating at full capacity. It has linked the powerful thermal power station at Luchegorks, situated in the north of the kray, with enterprises in the southern industrial regions. Thanks to this, ports and ship repair yards on the Pacific seaboard, pits and mines of non-ferrous metals, towns in Sikhote-Alin and the timber industrial enterprises in the Ussuri tayga have received additional cheap power. Agricultural Developments for 7-11 Mar Reported LD090442/LD120638 [Editorial Report] The following is a compilation of reports on agricultural developments in the USSR carried by Moscow Domestic Service in Russian on 7-11 March. Times of broadcasts are given in parentheses at the end of each item.

7 March

In the Crimea moisture-retention work and fertilizer drilling is in progress. In some rayons early grains are being sown. (0700 GMT)

8 March

Azerbaijan: Over 30,000 metric tons of seeds have been supplied to cotton farmers. Sowing will be carried out using the wide-row method on one-third of the acreage. (0004 GMT)

9 March

In the Tula Oblast, all of the Rossiya collective farm's seeds are being processed by a laser unit developed by Lvov scientists. Laser processing will give an additional grain yield of up to 20 percent for each hectare. (0100 GMT)

Azerbaijan cotton farms have been supplied with seeds far ahead of schedule; they have received over 30,000 metric tons of high-quality material. This season wide-row planting will be carried out on one-third of alloted areas to make more efficient use of agricultural machinery. Some of the seeds have been sent to Uzbekistan — partners in socialist competition. (0900 GMT)

In Moldavia, seed preparation has been completed. Over 40,000 metric tons of first class seed corn is being sent to other parts of the country for spring sowing. Earlier and higher-yield varieties are being developed. (1200 GMT)

10 March

More than 90 percent of the tractors have been repaired so far in Tselinograd Oblast; maintenance of other agricultural machinery is also nearly completed. Repair work is progressing faster than last year. (0430 GMT)

Kurgan Oblast farms have completed agricultural machinery repairs for spring field work. (0530 GMT)

All cultivating and sowing equipment has been made ready for agricultural workers in Mordovia. Eighty-seven percent of the seeds have already been brought up to the best sowing condition. Ninety percent of the tractors have been repaired. (0720 GMT)

All of the collective and state farms of Chuvashiya have been supplied with grain and pulse crop seeds, particularly with high-yield varieties.

Inspection by a commission consisting of agronomists, engineers, and experienced mechanizers has begun in Belorussia into the readiness of cereal grains using intensive technology for cultivation. The best fields under crop rotation have been set aside, a sufficient amount of fertilizer has been manufactured, and highly productive varieties for cultivation at different times, including Belorussian ones, have been collected. (0900 GMT)

11 March

Citrus fruit growing is undergoing accelerated development on an industrial basis in Turkmenistan. Farms in the valleys of the Kopet Dag area have expanded their lemon plantations. When the Karakum canal arrives in the arid subtropical area, citrus crops will occupy 3,000 hectares of irrigated land here. (0900 GMT)

Contract teams and team sections are to grow spring wheat using intensive technology in the Altay Kray on 1.2 million hectares. Advanced technology is also to be used there to cultivate sugar beet, sunflowers, potatoes, and vegetables on large areas. Preparation of seeds and equipment is under way. (1000 GMT)

Field work is already in progress at many collective and state farms in the south. So far only a few thousand hectares have been sown to spring grain crops. Inspection of winter grain crops has now been completed at most collective and state farms of the North Caucasus. In the past winter there were sharp temperature differentials and this had aroused the crop farmers' concern. The inspection has shown that on most fields the shoots have endured the winter well, especially in areas where intensive technology was applied. In the Central Asian republics alfalfa is being sown. It will cover considerably larger areas than in previous years. Mass planting of vineyards is now in progress in Tajikistan and other Central Asian republics, with mainly table and seedless grape varieties being planted. (1600 GMT)

In Armenia over 95 percent of the tractors and fodder gathering machinery is ready for the new season. (1900 GMT)

'Soyuz T-15' Launch Scheduled for 13 March

Preparations Nearing Completion

LD121627 Moscow TASS in English 1543 GMT 12 Mar 86

[Text] Baykonur Cosmodrome, March 12 TASS — TASS special correspondent Nikolay Zheleznov reports:

Preparations for the launch of the Soyuz T-15 spaceship are being completed. The rocket with the spaceship has already been brought to the launch pad.

Space crews who had got prepared for a space expedition arrived here on March 3. They had final fittings inside the spaceship and finalised medical check-ups. At a meeting of the state commission today, the directors of services reported readiness for the launch. Space crew members for the mission were named. These are Leonid Kizim and Vladimir Solovyov who had taken part in the 237-day space expedition aboard the Salyut-7 orbital station.

Blast-off is scheduled for 15.33, Moscow time, [1233 GMT] on March 13.

Prelaunch Press Conference

LD122246 Moscow Television Service in Russian 1800 GMT 12 Mar 86

[From the "Vremya" newscast]

[Text] The prelaunch preparations of the crew of cosmonauts are nearing completion at the Baykonur Cosmodrome. A press conference with the heads of cosmonaut training and the members of the crew of the Soyuz T-15 space vessel took place today in the Kosmonavt Hotel. [video shows cosmonauts behind glass screen, two men in military uniform one of whom is identified by caption as V.A. Shatalov; members of the press]

[Begin recording] [V.A. Shatalov, identified by caption] The meeting of the state commission has just ended. It reviewed the state of readiness of the whole complex for its routine task — the carrier rocket and the Soyuz T-15 space vessel — and the state of readiness of the crew; that is, both the main crew and the back-up crew have been confirmed. Here before you, before the journalists, is the main crew of the Soyuz T-15 space vessel which is to be launched tomorrow from the Baykonur Cosmodrome, Colonel Kizim and Vladimir Alekseyevich Solovyev. You already know them as participants in the longest flight. The third participant in that longest flight is present here; he has come to see off his comrades and he is doing this with great regret, because he says that he would have liked to have taken part in the flight himself.

The flight which is now in preparation is a routine, important, and serious piece of work in space. The first work to be done since the 27th congress, work which will allow science to look even deeper into the secrets on which depend the development of our industry, the development of the economy. It is this consideration which has determined the composition of the crew. They are very familiar with the Salyut-7 station and all of its systems. They lived on that station for almost 240 days. Well, in the intervening period they have been able to study and master the new Mir orbital station and therefore they can be entrusted with the task which is, one could say, the most complex of those which we intend for the next few years.

[Unidentified journalist] Would you tell us please what your training here at the cosmodrome consisted of?

[Kizim] This is the training undergone by every crew but greater attention has been given now to manual docking from a distance of about 400 meters and from great distances, of about 5,000 meters.

[Solovyev] Just like all the others, we came here approximately 2 weeks before the launch. The only difference, as the commander rightly said, was that more attention was paid to the dynamics of the station. We have everything we need here by way of training equipment. And apart from this, medical commission is rather complicated and serious.

[Second unidentified journalist] Slightly less than 20 hours is left before you go into the vessel. What have you got left to do?

[Kizim] To get a good sleep so that we feel fine.

[Solovyev] But seriously, though. Tomorrow morning we have to meet the doctors again to have our blood pressure, pulse, and so forth checked; we need to get a bit of sleep and write letters and pack our cases.

[Journalist] My second question. As has already been stated, you are the first to open up the space navigation season in the year of the 27th congress, on the eve of the 25th anniversary of Gagarin's launch. What can we wish you before your trip, before your work?

[Kizim] Success.

[Solovyev] Success.

[Journalist] We wish you that, and we are sure that you will have it. [end recording]

[A. Galkin — caption identification] [Video shows Proton rocket, with Soyuz attached, in horizontal position and then being lowered into vertical position]

At the cosmodrome today the morning was overcast and looked matte-colored in the drizzle. The rocket seemed intended for exploring the depths of the sea rather than for space flight. The rocket with the vessel docked to it is always brought out from the assembly and test block early in the morning. And this is not just because of tradition. After its resilient and streamlined body which is surrounded by a belt of supporting girders takes up a vertical position above the launch pad, it has to be filled with fuel and a multitude of checks have to be carried out on various systems. And there must be no divergence from the timetable. Everything goes strictly according to the instructions, every line of which has been proven by the whole 25 years of the history of manned flights. Here at the cosmodrome it is recalled that even on the day of Yuriy Gagarin's launch — and he went into orbit precisely from this launch pad — the specialist who wrote the phrase, Hooray, man is in space, in the measurement registration book was punished. So it is, no emotions. [Video shows gantries being placed around rocket]

And thus, the carrier rocket is in its technical position and the crew in the Kosmonavt Hotel are continuing to prepare for their flight according to their own timetable.

Further Reportage on Vega-1, Vega-2 Activities

Rendezvous Described

LD071952 Moscow TASS in English 1932 GMT 7 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow, March 7 TASS — TASS special correspondent Nikolay Zheleznov writes:

The Vega-1 station passed almost undamaged through the dust front surrounding the head of the comet. After the rendezvous with the comet the station continues telephotography and spectrometering of the comet and its surroundings. The Vega-2 station is now approaching the comet. They will meet in two days, and there are 14 million kilometres left for the station to cover. Thus, today in the morning specialists of the Institute of Space Studies worked for the first time with two interplanetary laboratories simultaneously.

"This unique possibility — to observe the comet from two sides — added both more work and more hope to the big international collective that gathered in Moscow", said the scientific director of this space headquarters Academician R. Sagdeyev. "Not only the discovery itself, but also its confirmation are important in science. We hope that on Sunday morning the Vega-2 station will both repeat the results obtained already during the first rendezvous with the comet and will deepen them. It is also important that the first flight permitted specialists to choose for the next photo taking session more informative working regimes. For instance, about 100 telephotos were received from Vega-2 today, which is twice the figure of the telephotos made from the same distance by Vega-1".

Specialists in telemetry confirmed today that practically all the systems of the first station, including lenses of the television system, continued to be operational. Panels of the solar batteries were slightly damaged by the dust particles of the comet that attacked the space apparatus with a speed of over 50 km per second. However, the energy that is left is quite enough for the continuation of communication sessions with the station. This makes it possible to obtain a stereoscopic portrait of Halley's comet as a result of the two rendezvous, to compare the data about the composition of the substance in the nucleus of the comet and in its "dust coat" which is 1,000 km thick, according to the results obtained during the sessions.

Today scientists managed to specify the distance at which the first station had approached the comet on March 6. The two celestial bodies — the natural and the man-made ones — approached each other at a distance of 8,900 km. The limits of the solid matter of the comet — its nucleus whose dimensions are estimated at 4-5 km — are not seen clearly on the photos so far. However, several hundred photos made in four days will undergo a complicated procedure of processing and interpretations. Besides according to calculations of specialists from the control centre, it is expected that Vega-2 will come close to the comet at a distance of 7,000 - 7,500 km.

We shall not have to wait long. On March 9, at 10.30, the large colour image of space station will again appear on the working monitors.

'Impressive Victory'

LD101859 Moscow TASS in English 1838 GMT 10 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow, March 10 TASS — Academician Roald Sagdeyev has characterised as an impressive victory for the international team of scientists the successful completion of the comprehensive program of studies of Halley's Comet with the help of the Soviet Vega-1 and Vega-2 automatic probes. This shows anew, he said, how fruitful the pooling of the efforts of specialists from different countries in the peaceful exploration of space can be.

At a press conference today the director of the Institute of Space Studies of the USSR Academy of Sciences summed up the main results of the unique experiment under the Venus-Halley's Comet project. He noted that work with the comet was not yet finished. A painstaking analysis of data will now proceed at the research centres and laboratories of the countries participating in the project. The two probes took more than a thousand pictures. It is the closest ever randezvous with a comet, a myterious body with interesting dynamic processes. The comet is now being fried up, so to speak, with its dust "coat" and even its body gradually evaporating and losing mass.

Whenever it passes by the sun, the comet loses about two centimetres in diametre. Specialists believe that the "wanderer" may exist for another 10,000 years — but scientists are yet to unravel the complex process of the comet's existence.

Debates are unfolding around the comet. Does it have one nucleus or two? There have even emerged two lines of thought over this problem, Sagdeyev said. As the data are further processed, we may yet see who is right. The passage of the Giotto graft by the comet on the night of March 14 may shed light on that problem, too. It cannot be ruled out, however, that mankind will not learn the answer till the year 2061, when the comet will return and give man another opportunity to take a close look at it.

Roger Bonnet, director of research programs of the European Space Agency, who addressed the journalists, expressed gratitude for the assistance received. The Vegas are known to supply information for the more accurate targeting of the Giotto space probe of the European Space Agency, which blasted off on August 2, 1985, for a rendezvous with Halley's Comet.

The success of the Vega probes makes us confident that our experiment will be lucky as well, Bonnet said. We have some fears too: Giotto is to pass closer to the comet, at a distance of some 500 km, which is risky. It is nine out of ten that the probe will accomplish its mission.

Various aspects of studies under the Venus-Halley's Comet project were highlighted by Tsvetana Gogosheva, team leader from the Central Space Research Laboratory of the Academy of Sciences of Bulgaria; Boris Valnicek, department head of the Astronomy Institute of the Academy of Sciences of Czechoslovakia; Rene Pellat, science advisor of the national Space Research Centre of France; physics Professor John Simpson of the Chicago University; and Villibald Ridler, director of the Austrian Space Research Institute.

Role of 'Mir' Space Station, Research Examined

LD081740 Moscow in English to North America
0000 GMT 8 Mar 86

[Discussion presented by unidentified announcer with Dr Grigoriy Khozin, not further identified, and Cosmonaut Vitaliy Sevastyanov; Khozin and Sevastyanov remarks recorded in Russian with superimposed translation]

[Text] [Announcer] At its 27th congress the Soviet Communist Party has called on the nation's economy and science to find new ways of solving economic problems and using the latest technology. Space exploration is one of the newest fields of human activity. On the 20th of last month the Soviet Union set into orbit the space lab Mir. Today we have two guests, Dr Grigoriy Khozin and Cosmonaut Vitaliy Sevastyanov. They'll examine the outlook for space research in this country. Here is what Sevastyanov has to say about the Mir orbiting station:

[Sevastyanov] Well, the station is flying in an unmanned mode. It's laid on to add special specialized modules, including those for astronomic, biological, and technological experiments. These can be separated from the station and put into mothballs right in orbit for a period of time. When necessary they can be reactivated. The Mir has a newer navigation system than its predecessor, the Salyut. It has taken over some of the functions of ground control too.

[Announcer] What makes the Mir an entirely new system, Vitaliy?

[Sevastyanov] Well, the Mir, along with its modules, is a permanent manned orbiting station. It has incorporated systems tried out throughout the years of the Salyut program. At the same time the Mir has greater space-worthiness than the Salyut. It will heavily rely on its own computers and will be able to process scientific data by itself before relaying themto the earth. What's more, the Mir has altogether new systems for approach and docking. It has six docking points.

[Announcer] How large will its crew be?

[Sevastyanov] That will depend on their missions and the size of their transport ships. At the moment the station can easily accommodate a crew of six, but this figure can be higher. All it takes is an extra spacecraft to bring more cosmonauts to the station. The main thing is to privide enough work for everyone. The station's equipment was designed to permit quick refits and replacements. After a certain period of operation this or that set of equipment will be replaced with a new one. Practically every unit is replaceable. This is going to add assembly and construction to cosmonauts' normal duties as researchers and experimenters.

Actually, some crews will be responsible for such new operations only. Their job will consist of preparing the station for various scientific missions.

[Announcer] Aren't space missions really becoming the order of the day? Suppose a biologist is needed up there in space for a month or so? Says Vitaliy Sevastyanov:

[Sevastyanov] Well, we haven't as yet come to the point when it will be possible to book on a space flight any person who has no special training but is otherwise healthy. We, of course, can give such a person a free space ride without assigning him or her any particular mission, but in this case there'd be no payoff. We cannot afford this yet. This, apart form being expensive, is pretty risky.

[Announcer] And now here is what Dr Khozin said in singling out the new aspects of the Mir program.

[Khozin] The human activity in space cannot be confined to short-term missions in near-earth space. According to the Communist Party's 27th Congress the solution of problems facing our economy and science will greatly depend on realizing our space program. Many of these tasks will require permanent human presence in space. Therefore we need this new station as well as new space ships.

[Announcer] What's the payoff, if any, from creating new space technology and equipment? An answer from Vitaliy Sevastyanov:

[Sevastyanov] Missions involving various applied research and lasting no less than 2 months began to pay off 10 years ago. For instance, when I was taking part in a mission aboard the Salyut-4 we carried out 28 contracts signed with various departments and agencies. This mission involved an orbiting station, a spaceship, and two delivery rockets. After comparing its costs with that of performing the same job on earth a special commission concluded that the mission had paid off.

As for modern missions, they make it possible not to break even but to make a profit. As a result they are becoming part and parcel of the national economy. Space technology offers great opportunities for intensified production in various economic sectors. Many of these have received a commercial payoff from relying on space programs. This country will be able to greatly boost its economy by using space to develop new technology, to forecast weather and conduct remote sensing, and by making the results of these efforts easily available throughout the country. To this end, the Soviet Union is working on new space craft.

Generals Discuss Preparedness for Defense

Civil Defense Chief Altunin

PM260844 Moscow EKONOMICHESKAYA GAZETA in Russian No 9, Feb 86 (Signed to Press 20 Feb 86) p 7

[Article by Hero of the Soviet Union Army General A.T. Altunin, chief of USSR Civil Defense and USSR deputy defense minister: "Guarding Peace and Socialism"]

[Text] A world without war and without weapons — that is the ideal of the CPSU and the Soviet state, an ideal whose origins lie in the intrinsic nature of our socialist system.

With the Decree on Peace in the very first days of the Great October Socialist Revolution, the young Land of the Soviets graphically demonstrated to all mankind that socialism and peace are indivisible. However, the overthrown exploiter classes and international imperialism began a furious struggle against the new social system in an attempt to stifle socialism in its cradle. The victorious proletariat, in alliance with the poorest peasantry, was forced to defend the gains of October with weapon in hand. Under the leadership of the Bolshevik party and V.I. Lenin the worker-peasant Red Army and Navy were created within a short time.

The 68th anniversary of the Soviet Armed Forces coincides with a historic event in the life of the Communist Party and the Soviet people — the opening of the 27th CPSU Congress.

The preparations for the congress and the interested discussion of the precongress documents create favorable conditions for accelerating our society's socioeconomic development and further enhancing the people's well-being. Soviet people are fully determined to implement the Leninist party's plans. But even now they are forced not to relax the attention paid to questions of the country's defense capability.

Our entire history cogently confirms one of the laws of the era of the transition from capitalism to socialism — the objective need for armed defense of the gains of socialism. It also graphically attests that socialism creates the preconditions for building a military organization qualitatively different from that of the exploiter society.

The superiority of the socialist state's military organization was displayed with particular force during the grim years of the Great Patriotic War.

At dawn on Sunday, 22 June 1941, the borders of our motherland were crossed by the 5-million-strong German fascist army, which was armed to the teeth by international imperialism and had experience of mounting combat operations. This was another attempt by the capitalist world to crush the socialist state.

My first battle outside Vitebsk is etched in my memory for my whole life. After a fierce bombing raid the enemy tanks appeared. We young soldiers and officers (I, a company commander, was only 19) had no experience of combating them. In those first moments you thought that it was impossible to hold out against this force, that it was invulnerable, that it would crush you and kill you. But then you said to yourself: "We must hold out!" My comrades-in- arms — Voronov, Seroshtan, Lysov — were certainly saying the same thing to themselves...

Though they had not been under fire before, the soldiers held out. No one wavered. With bundles of grenades and bottles filled with gasoline they went to meet this force. And they triumphed. It was not only the tanks that they incinerated, but their own fear too. And that is maybe the most important thing in war — mastering yourself.

"We are not slaves..." were the lines that we had once read haltingly from the school primer; and, as adults, we proved this to those who wanted to see slaves before them through the narrow slit of a tank observation window. The resistance to the Hitlerites mounted. It was based on the courage and skill of Soviet servicemen and on the art of commanders at all levels.

During the Great Patriotic War the heroic servicemen routed the fascist hordes outside Moscow, Stalingrad, and Leningrad and in the Caucasus and struck crushing blows against the enemy in the Kursk Bulge, in the right-bank Ukraine and Belorussia, and during the Yassy-Kishinev, Wisla-Oder, and Berlin operations.

The Soviet people and their valiant Armed Forces inflicted a crushing defeat on the invaders, defended the motherland's freedom and independence, and brought liberation to Europe's peoples.

Soviet people pay tribute to the contribution made to the rout of fascist Germany and militarist Japan by the peoples and armies of the anti-Hitler coalition and by all the peoples that actively struggled against the invaders and their accomplices. However, while assessing the allies' actions at their true worth, it is impossible to forget the historical truth, which is that the main contribution to the rout of the aggressors was made by the Soviet Union and its Armed Forces.

What were the sources of the invincibility of the Soviet Armed Forces? The answer to this question is instructive today in every respect.

The sources of our victory lay in the nature of socialism and the Soviet way of life and in the nationwide character of the Great Patriotic War. The victory was a triumph for the new social and state system born of Great October.

Soviet people rightly link the victory in the struggle against the German fascist invaders and Japanese militarism with the Communist Party's leading role. During the war the Communist Party was truly a fighting party.

...I recall New Year's eve, 1942. An open party meeting was held in our company before the landing of a force in Feodosiya. The atmosphere of the meeting was tense and businesslike. Everyone understood the seriousness of the task. Almost all the Communists spoke. They vowed to honorably fulfill their duty. Party organizer Vekov ordered that the debate be ended. Then Sergeant Bochkov stood up, seconded by Sergeant Malyshko: "Why can't we nonparty people say: Since Communists have the privilege of marching in front, admit us to the party too."

The last war demonstrated to the whole world the strength of the socialist ideology and morality and the friendship of the USSR's peoples, the unshakable strength of their fraternal alliance, and the advantages of the Soviet planned economy.

The rout of German fascism and then of Japanese militarism had a most profound impact on the entire course of world development. The world socialist system emerged and is developing successfully, the influence of the communist and workers parties increased; and the process of the disintegration of imperialism's colonial system accelerated, culminating in its collapse. But these results of World War II do not suit aggressive imperialist forces. These forces are continuing their attempts to revise them, including by preparing for and unleashing another world war, which today may place human civilization on the brink of nuclear disaster.

Fully aware of the responsibility that has fallen to its lot, the Soviet Union is doing everything necessary to consolidate peace. The 15 January 1986 statement by M.S. Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, again emphasizes that the course of peace and disarmament has been and will continue to be the linchpin of the foreign policy of the CPSU and the Soviet Government. The statement puts forward historic proposals for destroying nuclear and chemical weapons by the start of the 3d millennium and reducing conventional weapons. However, Washington's reaction to the USSR's new peace proposals cannot but arouse wariness. Thus promises to "seriously study the Soviet initiatives" are followed by statements of a different kind. For instance, Defense Secretary C. Weinberger asserts that the Pentagon has no intention of abandoning either the holding of nuclear weapons tests or the "star wars" plans.

Reactionary imperialist circles in the West, especially the United States, are continuing to step up military preparations. Under these conditions the Soviet people are forced to display great political vigilance and not to relax their efforts to strengthen the country's defense capability.

The establishment of strategic military parity between the USSR and the United States and between the Warsaw Pact Organization and NATO was a historic achievement by socialism. The preservation of this balance is a real guarantee of ensuring peace and international security.

Thanks to the party's tireless concern and the Soviet people's selfless labor the USSR Armed Forces have a high combat potential that now represents a firm fusion of personnel's military skill, ideological steadfastness, organization and discipline, and loyalty to their patriotic and international duty, and a high level of technical equipment.

In the harsh north and the sultry south, on the western borders and the Far Eastern borders — everywhere in the limitless expanses of the motherland and on the seas and oceans the armed defenders of the Soviet land vigilantly perform their duty. They are prepared (and some people in the West should not forget this) to defend our motherland's borders and socialism's gains as skillfully, courageously, and steadfastly as their fathers and grandfathers did.

Currently,the economy is increasingly becoming the target of armed action, throughout the depth of the country's territory. This objectively puts forward the task of carrying out in good time measures aimed at increasing the economy's survivability and transforming military economic potential into a real military force. An important role in resolving this task is played by civil defense, which is called upon to ensure the protection of the population from modern means of destruction, an increase in the stability of the functioning of national economic sectors and facilities during wartime, and the carrying out of rescue and urgent emergency repair work in centers of contamination.

Civil defense training is not merely the assimilation of one branch of knowledge but the mastery of very specific duties and methods that you need to be ready to carry out at a moment's notice. Realizing that the need for constant readiness to carry out civil defense measures is a demand of the time stemming from imperialism's aggressive essence, Soviet people participate actively in their implementation.

The Soviet Armed Forces have traveled a long and glorious path. Their high combat might and constant combat readiness have been and remain a firm guarantee of the security of the sacred borders of our socialist homeland and of the Soviet people's peaceful labor. Rallied closely around the Communist Party and its Leninist Central Committee and in a single formation with the armies of the Warsaw Pact countries, they will continue invincibly to guard peace and socialism.

Central Group Commander

AU261114 Prague RUDE PRAVO in Czech 21 Feb 86 p 6

[Article by Colonel General V.F. Yermakov, commander of the Central Group of Soviet Forces: "Allegiance to International Duty"]

[Excerpts] The working people of our country, the members of the USSR Armed Forces, and together with them the members of the Central Group of Soviet Forces, are celebrating the 68th anniversary of the founding of the Soviet Army and the Soviet Navy in an atmosphere of great political and working spirit. The 27th CPSU Congress will begin in Moscow on Tuesday, the congress that will become the watershed for the further stage in our country's development.

The Soviet people must implement the plans of our Leninist party in a complex military, political and international situation, in which imperialist aggression threatens the world of socialism. Under these conditions, a comprehensive strengthening of the defense capability of the Soviet State acquires the character of one of the most important sociopolitical factors of the country's accelerated development. The sacred duty of a socialist country's armed defenders — to be ready at any moment to successfully repel imperialist aggression, to smash the adversary at any price should he unleash and wage war — is, at the same time, an international task. Therefore, together with the allied armies of the Warsaw Pact member-countries, side by side with the Czechoslovak People's Army [CSLA], we are duty bound to ensure the security of the socialist community.

Soviet soldiers who are at the forward outpost of the socialist community, on the territory of the fraternal CSSR, are mastering the military arts, are incessantly demonstrating initiative and a creative approach in combat activity side by side with the soldiers of the CSLA, and are trying to fulfill as much as possible the noble and responsible mission entrusted to them by the fatherland.

Our soldiers are well aware of how complex and dangerous the current international situation is. It is being systematically aggravated by the U.S. imperialist circles and their NATO allies. Despite the many peace proposals put forward by the USSR and the other socialist countries, they proceed with their unbridled feverish arms buildup and are attempting to achieve a decisive position in the world, particularly in the military sphere. Under these conditions, the Soviet Union is forced to reinforce its defense capability and to undertake measures to ensure the security of its own country as well as of its allies.

"In the future, too, we will spare no efforts so that the USSR Armed Forces have everything they need to reliably defend our fatherland and its allies and so that they are not taken by surprise or caught unprepared" — these words by Mikhail Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, constitute our combat program. Members of the Central Group of Forces, boundlessly devoted to the defense of their fatherland, the party, and the people, regard as their main task to continue in all possible ways to enhance their political vigilance and combat capability, and to reliably safeguard the peaceful work of the people, who are building socialism, and the great successes of socialism. Thanks to the active and purposeful work of commanders and political agencies, party and Komsomol organizations among the troops of the Soviet Group of Forces, socialist competition is increasing daily under the slogan: We will fulfill the conclusions of the 27th CPSU Congress and reliably defend the successes of socialism.

Our members approach today's holiday as well as the 27th CPSU Congress with magnificent results in combat training. This reflects the fruits of the extensive efforts aimed at further strengthening the combat cooperation with the CSLA. The regular exchanges of combat experience among members of the fraternal armies, the joint tactical exercises and training, and the numerous contacts between our members during various actions of the ideological, cultural, and sporting nature, contribute considerably to the enhancement of combat skills and the coordination of the formations' actions. We can say with certainty that precisely thanks to that, our class brotherhood and our comradeship-in-arms have been strengthening from day to day and achieving a higher standard; that our combative army bond — the bond of patriots-internationalists — has been becoming tighter and firmer; that together with the troops of the other Warsaw Pact member-countries they are always prepared to defend the successes of socialism. For us, Soviet soldiers, the soil of the Czechs and Slovaks is as sacred as our own soil. Should it be necessary, in difficult times we will defend Czechoslovakia with the same courage and fearlessness as our own socialist fatherland. Our enemies should not forget that.

The Soviet Army and Navy are celebrating the 68th anniversary of their founding in a condition even mightier and more invincible than before. The USSR Armed Forces, including in their united combat ranks the members of the Central Group of Soviet forces, are demonstrating their supreme political vigilance, and will continue to vigilantly safeguard the successes of socialism, peace, and the security of nations; they will fulfill their tasks.

PRAVDA CARRIES TEST BAN APPEAL, GORBACHEV ANSWER

Six Leaders' Message

PM131935 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 14 Mar 86 First Edition p 4

[Text] To Mr M.S. Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee

Esteemed General Secretary!

The world welcomed your summit meeting with President Reagan last year and the confirmation of your resolve to achieve the speediest results at the talks on nuclear and space arms. We, however, are concerned that so far no agreement has been reached concerning specific measures "preventing the arms race in space and halting it on earth." This task is of paramount importance for the future of mankind, when the very survival of our planet is at stake. As long as nuclear weapons exist, there can be no security in the world. We are all living in the face of the terrifying possibility of our death in a nuclear conflagration, whether as a result of an accident or of evil design. That is why we feel a sense of duty to do everything possible to avert this threat and to create a new concept of world security without nuclear weapons.

The next summit meeting between you and President Reagan, which is expected this year, will, in our opinion, be a decisive opportunity for you both to agree on specific steps to halt the nuclear arms race.

We believe that we must encourage everything which could be done to create trust and a positive atmosphere for achieving such accords at your summit meeting. One such confidence-building measure would be for both your countries to refrain from any nuclear tests in the period through the next summit meeting. This could open the way to an agreement mutual moratorium on nuclear blasts with the appropriate verification [proverka]. This would also facilitate talks on a treaty on a universal ban on tests.

We urge you not to sanction any nuclear tests in the forthcoming months prior to the summit meeting. We are convinced that this would be interpreted throughout the world as evidence that at this meeting you are both prepared to draw practical conclusions from your joint statement in Geneva that "nuclear war must never be unleashed and there can be no victors in it."

We renew our proposal to render assistance to the verification [proverka] of any suspension of nuclear tests and to eliminate doubts regarding its fulfillment and possible violations. This assistance could include on-side inspection [inspektsia] and observation measures on your territory and in our countries.

You bear the main responsibility for ensuring our common survival. People throughout the world support any step which you take to bring us closer to the goal of liberating earth from the threat of nuclear war.

Yours sincerely,

Raul Alfonsin, Argentina
Miguel de la Madrid, Mexico
Olof Palme, Sweden

Gorbachev Response

PM131757 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 14 Mar 86 First Edition p 1

["The Reply from M.S. Gorbachev, General Secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, to the Joint Message from the Leaders of Argentina, India, Mexico, Tanzania, Sweden, and Greece" -- PRAVDA headline]

It grieves me profoundly to say that Olof Palme, felled by the villainous hand of a lowly assassin, is no longer among you. His tragic death rankles in the hearts of all those who cherish peace, for the preservation of which he was campaigning impassionately and tirelessly.

Esteemed Messrs,

On behalf of the Soviet leadership, I want to express to you our sentiments of profound respect for the consistency and purposefulness that are characteristic of your efforts to have the arms race ended and to avert nuclear war. In our view, your promotion of joint initiatives meets in full measure the task of organizing constructive and positive interaction of states and peoples on a worldwide scale, especially now that the very fate of the human race is hanging in the balance.

Ideas of universal security without nuclear weapons, voiced in your letter, are quite consistent with the concept of the establishment of a comprehensive system of international security put forward by us at the recent 27th CPSU Congress. One of the fundamental principles of such a system should be the complete and irreversible elimination of nuclear weapons, and we are unanimous with you in this respect.

I think that our viewpoints also coincide in that the ending of nuclear tests can and must become an important step on the path towards ridding mankind of the nuclear arms race, with all its pernicious consequences.

Obviously, it is no chance that you are raising this question anew today, not long before the expiration of the Soviet Union's unilateral moratorium on nuclear explosions. The extra time we granted the U.S. Administration to weigh our proposals is running out. We cannot extend it unilaterally forever. Having refrained from all nuclear explosions, both test and peaceful, for over seven months now, we have already paid a certain price both militarily and economically.

At the same time, in response to your appeal to the Soviet Union and the United States not to conduct any nuclear explosions until the next Soviet-American summit meeting, we state: The Soviet Union shall not conduct nuclear explosions after March 31 either -- until the United States carries out its first nuclear explosion.

As for the problem of verification [kontrol], I would like to stress anew that we attach much importance to it because we have an interest in accords being strictly honored and in all the participants being completely certain of the fact.

As regards a nuclear test ban, verification [kontrol] can be ensured by national technical means and also with the help of international procedures -- including on-site inspections [inspektsiya na mestakh] if need be. We offer the U.S. side to reach agreement on possibilities for observers from both sides to visit sites where questioned phenomena occur on request and on a reciprocal basis to remove possible doubts about whether such phenomena are related to nuclear explosions.

We are willing to accept your proposal -- naturally, if it is accepted by the other side,too -- of assistance in verification [proverka] of the halting of nuclear tests, including on-site inspections[inspektsii na mestakh].

Naturally, a treaty banning nuclear weapons tests on the basis of interational law is needed fully to resolve the problem of testing. We suggest that work be started to draw up such a treaty without delay and that appropriate talks in any form -- bilateral, tripartite or multilateral, moreover without linkage to any other questions -- be resumed or started. And we offer those who fear that questions of verification [kontrol] may be pushed into the background at such talks to engage simultaneously in resolving these questions, too, from the outset of such talks so as to have a comprehensive accord as soon as possible.

I can assure you that the Soviet Union for its part will continue to do everything necessary to put the solution of the urgent problem of ending nuclear tests onto practical tracks and to secure the complete elimination of the nuclear arms arsenals.

With respect,

M. Gorbachev

REAGAN SAYS TEST BAN PROPOSAL 'UNJUST TO U.S.'

LD132035 Moscow TASS in English 2017 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] Washington March 13 TASS -- In an interview with the newspaper BALTIMORE SUN President Reagan again turned down the appeals of the Soviet Union, as well as of leaders of Argentina, India, Mexico, Tanzania, Sweden and Greece to stop all the nuclear explosions and immediately start talks on concluding a treaty on the all-embracing banning of nuclear tests.

According to Reagan, this proposal is "unjust towards the U.S." which allegedly lags behind in modernization and the creation of new nuclear weapon systems. He also mentioned verification difficulties. The President's statements are at variance with the reality. This was pointed out by American specialists on more than one occasion. Thus, the influential Defense Information Centre cited the data showing that the U.S. had staged more nuclear tests than the Soviet Union which has been observing unilaterally a moratorium on nuclear explosions since August 6, 1985. BALTIMORE SUN wrote recently that on the whole the number of nuclear tests staged by the U.S. was greater by one third than the corresponding figure for the Soviet Union.

As for the President's statement about difficulties with the verification of the moratorium on nuclear tests, it is emphasized again in the answer of the General Secretary of the CPSU Central Committee Mikhail Gorbachev to the leaders of six countries that the Soviet Union is ready for the creation of a proper verification system, including on-site inspection.

ISRAELYAN STATEMENT AT GENEVA DISARMAMENT TALKS

LD131203 Moscow TASS in English 1155 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] Geneva March 13 TASS -- The Soviet Union will work perseveringly to assert the principle of peaceful co-existence in inter-state relations and act as a vigorous advocate of the implementation of the programme for eliminating completely weapons of mass annihilation by the end of the current century, said Viktor Israelyan. The head of the U.S.S.R. delegation spoke today at the plenary session of the disarmament conference. In our day, when the task of creating a comprehensive system of international security is as acute as never before, the Soviet Union proposes the fundamental principles of such a system, which are fair and take into account the interests of all states. They include, among others:

-- Renunciation by the nuclear powers of war -- both nuclear and conventional -- against each other or against third countries;

-- Prevention of an arms race in outer space, cessation of all nuclear weapons tests and the total destruction of such weapons, a ban on and the destruction of chemical weapons, and renunciation of the development of other means of mass annihilation;

-- A strictly controlled lowering of the levels of military capabilities of countries to limits of reasonable adequacy;

-- Disbandment of military alliances, and as a stage towards this - renunciation of their enlargement and of the formation of new ones;

- Balanced and commensurate reduction of military budgets.

The refusal to take the reasonable approach suggested by the U.S.S.R. threatens with further scaling up of the nuclear arms race and its spread to outer space, which in the longer term will bring about only increased tension, fear and mistrust in inter-state relations, will replace strategic stability with strategic chaos and will augment dangers a multiple times. The U.S. Strategic Defense Initiative, if implemented, will result in this, Israelyan said.

The representative of the USSR noted the tremendous importance for mankind's vital activity of the peaceful exploration of outer space, in particular, by means of satellites of a variety of purpose. The studies of the Halley's Comet, which were successfully conducted under the "Vega" project, can serve as an example of productive cooperation among many countries in this field.

Considering the fact that some countries are not prepared at present to solve the problem of preventing the arms race in outer space in its entirety, the Soviet Union now proposes taking partial measures which build up trust in the field of space activity, namely, to conclude an international agreement on ensuring the immunity of space objects. Such an agreement would meet the interests of all countries and be a major step towards banning completely the use of force in outer space and from outer space with regard to earth, a step from "star wars" to "star peace", Israelyan said.

MIKHAYLOV CALLS FOR AGREEMENT AT VIENNA TALKS

[Text] Vienna March 13 TASS - Ambassador Valerian Mikhaylov, the leader of the Soviet delegation, who addressed the plenary meeting of the Vienna talks today, dwelt specifically on the socialist countries' proposal to get down jointly to drawing up the text of an agreement. He declined as biased the assertions of the West that the draft accord tabled by the Warsaw Treaty countries on February 20 this year on the initial reductions by the Soviet Union and the USA of their land troops and armaments with the subsequent non-increase in the levels of the armed forces and aramaments of the sides in Central Europe "is not an adequate reply" to "the far-reaching Western proposal of December 5, 1985."

The ambassador demonstrated that it was the draft of the socialist countries that ensured a sensible, balanced and realistic basis enabling the sides to reach accord both on the substance of the main contents of the agreement and on measures of the senible verification of compliance with it without prejudice to the security interests of any of the partners in the talks.

The question thus boils down anew to whether the NATO countries are prepared really to seek accord on the basis of mutually acceptable compromise. They do not so far show readiness to do so. Moreover, there is an obvious contradiction between the statements made by Western representatives before we tabled our draft agreement on February 20 and the proposal to get down jointly to writing the text of an agreement, on the one hand, and what we hear now, on the other.

A strange metamorphosis is happening to the statements of the West and its present-day action. The representatives of the NATO countries rose up in arms against both the draft agreement and the proposals of the Warsaw Treaty countries to get down jointly to writing the text of an agreement. This reaction is all the more difficult to understand since our detailed draft agreement, if one takes an unbiased approach to it, really constitutes a new and substantial step towards bringing closer the positions of the sides. It contains additional constructive elements which were absent from the proposal made by the socialist countries in February last year and takes account of those elements of the Western position which seem acceptable to us. It also offers compromise solutions on a number of important aspects where differences between the sides are especially considerable, including questions of verification.

Mikhaylov stressed that the draft of the socialist countries broadened the practical possibility to reach accord and provided proper conditions for starting joint work to draft the text of an agreement. This work could help formalize in legal and contractual formulae those aspects in the positions of the sides which are identical, to finalize individual stipulations, articles and elements, that is, to make headway more purposefully. Those points and questions which cannot be settled on a mutually acceptable basis could for the time being be sidelined.

This joint work, we think, would not be confined to a formal comparison of the positions of the sides. It could help to break them down into details and to look for possible mutually acceptable solutions.

The leader of the Soviet delegation pointed out the arbitrarily inflated and unrealistic character of the Western demands on the system of control and verification and noted that the West for its part had not only failed to introduce any constructive changes in its stand on verification since 1979 but, conversely, had even toughened it.

This does not testify to the flexibility or willingness of the Western participants to look in practice for mutually acceptable solutions at the talks. He urged the West to assume a realistic and businesslike stand which could make it possible to reach a mutually acceptable agreement in Vienna.

COMMENTS ON LATEST ROUND OF STOCKHOLM CONFERENCE

USSR Delegate Grinevskiy

LD141020 Moscow TASS in English 1015 GMT 14 Mar 86

[Text] Stockholm March 14 TASS -- The latest session of the Conference on Confidence- and Security-Building Measures and Disarmament in Europe has closed in the Swedish capital today.

Summing up the results of the latest round of the talks, the leader of the Soviet delegation, Oleg Grinevskiy, said that some progress had been made thanks to the efforts of socialist, neutral and non-aligned states and that a number of formulae on the non-use of force, notification of major military exercises, invitation of observers, etc. had been produced. However, he stressed, the USA and its closest NATO allies keep avoiding a search for solutions to major unresolved problems at the conference and do not show readiness for businesslike and serious negotiations. As a consequence, business at the conference is making an inadmissibly slowly progress. Agreement has so far been reached mostly on peripheral questions but the negotiating machinery is often running idle.

'U.S. Marking Time'

LD140842 Moscow TASS in English 0809 GMT 14 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow March 14 TASS -- "At the Soviet-American summit in Geneva, the leaders of the two countries voiced their intention to contribute jointly with the other states participating in the Stockholm Conference to its early and successful completion," Mikhail Kostikov says in PRAVDA. "The joint Soviet-American statement says that the sides reiterated the need to adopt at the conference a document which would include both mutually acceptable confidence formalization of the principle of the non-use of force. That was in Geneva, however, but the situation in Stockholm, regrettably, is different. The U.S. delegation is still trying at the negotiating table to avoid tackling the substance of the question by invoking hardly relevant stipulations from the U.N. Charter and the Helsinki Final Act."

"Compared with a complex of broad political and military confidence building measures formulated by the delegations of socialist countries, the NATO package of proposals looks meagre and obviously inadequate," the journalist says. "It takes a glaringly narrow approach to military technical matters and constitutes an attempt to secure unilateral advantage by all means.

"It is also symptomatic that as the Stockholm forum proceeds, the socialist countries have more than once supplemented and concretized their proposals. The same can be said of the group of neutral and non-aligned countries, which are contributing to the approximation of the positions of East and West. Contrary to that, the NATO package remains unchanged. It seems to be frozen and actually to exude a cold breath. It is only the tactics that is varied: While at the outset the opponents of accords flatly rejected the proposals of the socialist countries, now they tend to resort to procrastination and propagandizing.

"...The USA and its NATO allies are just marking time in Stockholm," the correspondent stresses. "The peoples of Europe cannot approve of such an approach."

THATCHER RESPONSE TO USSR PROPOSALS CONDEMNED

LD131605 Moscow TASS in English 0906 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow March 13 TASS -- The negative stand towards the Soviet peace programme, taken by the Thatcher government, does not reflect the prevailing sentiments either in Britain itself, or in the West as a whole. Therefore, it cannot be considered as final. This conclusion has been drawn by the PRAVDA London correspondent Arkadiy Maslennikov, commenting on the reply of the Thatcher government which turned down the Soviet January 15 proposals on disarmament which it had received. In the British letter, just as in the U.S. President Reagan's reply to the Soviet proposals, questions of nuclear disarmament are linked with obviously far-fetched "need of levelling the balance in conventional armaments" and broadening discussions on regional, bilateral and other problems.

The attempts of the British prime minister and other cabinet members to somehow justify the negative stand, the author points out, produced no impression either on the Labourites or representatives of other oppositional parties.

The unpopularity of the British Government's stand is so obvious that even the press bodies, which usually actively support the Tory policy, have to dissociate themselves from it.

The Thatcher government's reply to the Soviet proposals will be the cause of wrath and indignation of millions of people in Britain, whatever their occupation and whatever their religious and political views, representatives of the press have been told by general secretary of the Communist Party of Great Britain, Gordon McLennan. This wrath should be translated into determination and action for changes to be introduced into the British policy. Thatcher's reply provides evidence that the British Government does not have its own independent policy, it just follows the U.S. course.

The Soviet programme of ridding the world of nuclear and other weapons of mass destruction has given a ray of hope to the broad masses of the British and other West European peoples, the PRAVDA correspondent has been told by well-known politician, British MP, Anthony Benn. And this is the factor which will be exerting an ever-growing impact on the situation in Western countries. Whatever stand is taken by the governments of those countries, they are not bound to ignore the will of the peoples.

UN COMMITTEE DISCUSSES U.S. DEMAND FOR STAFF CUT

LD132337 Moscow TASS in English 2243 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] New York March 14 TASS -- The United Nations Host Country Relations Committee, acting at the request of the Soviet delegation, on Thursday started deliberations on the illegitimate, arbitrary and unjustified demand by the U.S. Government for a reduction in the staffs of the permament missions of the USSR, Belorussia and the Ukraine at the United Nations.

The action is a gross violation by the United States of its commitment to ensure necessary conditions for the normal operation of the United Nations and unimpeded participation in its work of member states, said Vasiliy Safronchuk, acting permanent representative of the USSR to the United Nations.

The U.S. attempts to assume the right to fix the size of permanent missions to the United Nations are incompatible with international law, inadmissible and unacceptable. They are directed against the United Nations, against all member states of the organization.

USSR Delegate Comments

LD132049 Moscow TASS in English 1856 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] New York March 13 TASS -- The Soviet delegation to the United Nations categorically rejects the U.S. claims to fix the size of permament missions of states at the United Nations, Vasiliy Safronchuk, the USSR's acting permanent representative to the United Nations, has told a press conference here.

The illegimate actions by the American Administration which unceremoniously demanded cuts in the staffs of the missions of the USSR, the Ukraine and Belorussia at the United Nations are totally incompatible with international law, and constitute interference in the affairs that are exclusively within competence of the U.N. member states.

The question of whether the presence of the U.N. headquarters is so necessary in the country that does not abide by its commitments to the United Nations Organization is regarded as pertinent in the U.N. circles.

Safronchuk said that he called at the U.N. secretary-general, Javier Perez de Cuellar, and informed him that the Soviet Mission at the United Nations had lodged a resolute protest with the United States' U.N. Mission over the latest hostile actions constituted interference in the internal affairs of the U.N. member state since it alone can decide on the size of its mission.

The U.N. secretary-general expressed full political and moral support for the Soviet delegation, Safronchuk said. He stressed that Perez de Cuellar believes that such questions should be resolved by consultations between both sides jointly with the United Nations, rather than by unlawful demarches as the U.S. Administration did.

The question of the U.S. unlawful actions will be discussed at a special meeting, opening on March 13, of the Committee on Host Country Relations convened at the Soviet delegation's request.

WESTERN MEDIA OVER EMPHASIZING SOVIET PROBLEMS

LD140233 Moscow TASS International Service in Russian 0010 GMT 14 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow, 14 Mar (TASS) -- "Western propaganda would not have been its usual self if, commenting on the results of the 27th CPSU Congress, it had only informed people in an objective and truthful way," Yuriy Kornilov writes in SOVETSKAYA ROSSIYA. A number of Western propaganda centers and press organs that specialize in misinformation and slanderous atttacks on socialism are attempting to use the mere fact of wide discussion in the USSR and adoption of the basic guidelines of the country's economic and social development as a pretext for deliberately overemphasizing difficulties and unresolved problems and for distorting the meaning and purpose of the plans mapped out by the party, while passing over our undoubted achievements.

The chosen "arguments" do not strike one as being original. Some (for example the U.S. CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR), reckoning on the problems, shortcomings and difficulties that were openly discussed at the congress, are trying to convince the Western man in the street of some mythical "advantages" of the notorious "free enterprise system." Others, (the French FIGUARO or the West German WESTDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG), not bothering with any proof, foretell "the failure" of the Soviet plans.

Making propaganda sorties on the impressive plans of the economic and social development of the USSR, many foreign "Sovietologists" are trying hard to find in the Soviet Union the same incurable illnesses that bend down the Western world, the author notes. Some -- for example, the London TIMES -- prophesy that the Soviet Union is facing "the threat of unemployment." Others predict that socialism, and first of all the Soviet Union, "will inevitably get to know" what the sporadic crises of production, inflation, and feverishly jumping prices are like.

There is also another trend that is clearly seen in the newest research by "Sovietologists:" Their growing irritation over the fact that all economic changes and reforms mapped out by the USSR will be carried out in the framework of socialism and do not envisage any abandonment of socialist economic principles. The French LE MONDE, for example, indulging in malevolence about Soviet economic policy, does not conceal its unhappiness with the fact that the congress did not go so far as to abandon the principles of socialism, but, on the contrary, "confidence in the advantages of the socialist system was affirmed aloud."

'PROFOUND' DIFFERENCES SEEN IN NAVIGATION TALKS

LD131941 Moscow TASS in English 1913 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow March 13 TASS -- TASS commentator Mikhail Vladimirov writes:

At the Soviet-American talks on navigation which are under way here the sides learned better the approach of each other to the problem of concluding a new bilateral branch agreement. However, there remain profound differences dealing with the application of the basic principles regulating international navigation.

The Soviet side proceeds from the assumption that the administrative methods of distributing cargoes and setting freight rates in international sea navigation can deepen the crisis of world navigation and affect negatively the development of economic ties. The Soviet side believes that intergovernmental navigation agreements should be based on the principles of the freedom of navigation and on the rejection of any forms of discrimination.

Under the draft agreement on navigation submitted by the American side at the previous talks, the actions of ships of the two countries calling at the ports of each other would be confined to the transportation of cargoes of reciprocal trade. Practically all the terms of freight transportation would be worked out on the intergovernmental level.

The delegation now staying in Moscow is led by John Gaughan. He pointed out a good atmosphere at the negotiations, but did not elaborate on the negotiations themselves.

CRITICISM OF U.S. UN DECISION CONTINUES

PRAVDA Commentator

PM131205 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 13 Mar 86 First Edition p 5

[Tomas Kolesnichenko "Commentator's Column": "Cold Winds Over the United Nations"]

[Text] Storm clouds have gathered over the United Nations, and cold winds are blowing in its direction. But not off New York's East River, on whose bank the headquarters of this international organization are located. As France's TF-1 television company remarks, "Cold winds are once again blowing from Washington," where "draconian White House action" has been taken against the United Nations.

It is a question of a step unprecedented in the history of the world community -- a step taken by the Washington administration, which has demanded a 40-percent reduction in the diplomatic personnel of the permanent missions of the USSR, the Ukrainian SSR, and the Belorussian SSR at the United Nations in New York by 1 April 1988. And that is not all. Realizing that this provocative demand is incompatible with the norms of international law and is essentially unlawful, the administration in the person of Pentagon chief C. Weinberger declares in advance that it has no intention of heeding the opinion of legal experts and will not alter its decision.

An absurdity? Yes, an absurdity, but with an ulterior motive, as it were. This is not the first time the United Nations.

It is sufficient to recall Washington's provocations against UNESCO, the acts of terrorism committed against the socialist countries' permanent missions with the connivance of the New York police, hostile sallies against the United Nations, vociferous threats to "expel" this organization from the United States, and so forth. In short, a whole chain of constant provocations is being lined up with undermining the United Nations and doing it as much damage as possible. And the present step by the administration is just another link in this chain. As a matter of fact, Washington does not particularly hide this fact, calling this policy a "strategy of overcoming the United Nations." Washington uses these methods in an attempt to break the UN member countries' opposition to the U.S. imperialist course.

The question arises, however -- Why has Washington openly undertaken a scandalous provocation right now? Here is what Britain's DAILY MAIL writes in this connection: "The administration might have taken this step with an eye on 'internal consumption.'" It is primarily a question, the newspaper writes, of pushing "plans for higher military spending through a skeptically disposed Congress." We Europeans, the newspaper emphasizes, "must tell R. Reagan that his tactic appears risky and irresponsible."

It is also an obvious fact that Washington is deliberately setting out to exacerbate Soviet-American relations and is trying to create additional obstacles in order to evade a constructive response to the new Soviet initiatives and to divert world public attention from them. As the USSR Foreign Ministry statement emphasizes, the U.S. Administration must realize that such actions increase mistrust of its policy and in no way create a favorable background for a summit meeting.

The U.S. policy with regard to the United Nations has no support in the world arena. After all, the United States is certainly not the only country where the UN headquarters could be located. And Washington ought to remember this.

TASS Analyst

["United States Breaches International Law -- Analysis" -- TASS identifier]

[Text] Moscow March 13 TASS -- By TASS analyst Prof. Ivan Lukashuk, a member of the Executive Committee of the Soviet International Law Association.

One gets the impression that people from the White House are trying to prove that they can do what they please and don't have to reckon with international law, moral standards, or any other universally recognizedd norms of international conduct. This is evidence by an unceremonious demand of the U.S. Department of State on a 40 percent cut in the diplomatic personnel of the permanent missions of the U.S.S.R., the Ukraine and Belorussia to the United Nations in New York.

From the standpoint of international law the unlawful character of that demand causes no doubt. In accordance with Article 105 of the Charter of the United Nations, representatives of the member-countries enjoy such priviliges and immunities as are necessary for the independent exercise of their functions in connection with the organization. The question of the number of diplomatic personnel of the missions should be resolved in the spirit of this provision.

This provision was reiterated by the 1975 Vienna Convention that enshrined the norms that have taken shape in international practice with respect to the status of the missions of states to international organizations. Article 14 of the convention deals specifically with the number of mission personnel. It reaffirms that the personnel number is determined with due account of the functions of the organization, the requirements of a given mission and the circumstances and conditions existing in the host country. Naturally enough the personnel number should not go beyond the limits that are reasonable and normal.

The Vienna Convention says further that representatives of the states are accredited to an international organization, and not to the state on whose territory they are based (Article 11). The appointment of representatives, and their number are within the competence of a member-state. As to the host country, it is simply notified in advance by the organization (Article 5).

The U.S.S.R., the Ukraine and Belorussia are active participants in the manyfold activities of the United Nations. Over the past years the number of U.N. bodies, and hence, their meetings and conferences more than doubled. This could not but bring about an increase in the number of the mission personnel.

As to the circumstances and conditions existing in the host country, they are extremely unfavorable for Soviet representatives -- the factor that makes them rely only on their own personnel. This alone demonstrates that it is groundless to compare the number of personnel of the Soviet missions with the personnel number of the U.S. mission to the United Nations. The operations of the latter are backed by the U.S. Department of State, as well as numerous American research organizations and firms.

The U.S. Department of State deliberately ignores the important circumstance that the case in point is the number of diplomatic personnel not of one, but of three missions. In accordance with the Soviet constitutional law and the 1945 Yalta agreement, the Ukrainian S.S.R., the Belorussian S.S.R. as well as the U.S.S.R. are among the original members of the United Nations. Disregard for this circumstance comes as a violation of the sovereign rights of the U.S.S.R. and its constituent republics.

The fact that the number of personnel of the Soviet missions is not beyond reasonable and normal limits is acknowledged both by the United Nations and the U.S. which took part in the formalities connected with the arrival and stay of each official. Then all of a sudden came this "insight" of the American authorities which demanded totally unexpectedly and in an unsuitable form that the number of officials be almost halved, not merely reduced by several persons.

This confirms that the case in point is not that the number of officials is beyond reasonable or normal limits. It seems that the thrust of that American move is directed against the United Nations and other international organizations within its system. The U.S. policy is in increasing contradiction with the ideals, purposes and principles of the United Nations system. Ever more frequently American delegations find themsleves in moral and political isolation and vote practically alone against the resolutions backed by the overwhelming majority of states.

Attempts are made to find a way out of the existing situation in the American style -- through the use of power. Hence, the incessant blackmail of the United Nations, a unilateral cut in the contribution to its budget, the withdrawal from the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, renunciation of the obligatory jurisdiction of the U.N. International Court of Justice when it dared not to support the U.S. in its dispute with Nicaragua.

And now comes this new unlawful move aimed at complicating further the activities of the members-states' missions at the United Nations, and hence, the functioning of the organization itself.

U.S. 'FACTORY OF INTERNATIONAL TERROR' DENOUNCED

PM131502 Moscow SOVETSKAYA ROSSIYA in Russian 13 Mar 86 First Edition p 3

[Mikhail Ozerov article: "Who Shoots and Why?; Policy of Force and Aggression"]

[Text] "Undeclared wars, the export of counterrevolution in all forms, political assassinations, the taking of hostages, skyjackings, bombings on streets, at airports, and at railroad stations -- this is the repulsive face of terrorism..."

[These words are taken] from the CPSU Central Committee Political Report to the 27th party congress.

Olof Palme has been killed... Moscow learned about this on the morning of 1 March. And the sun of the incipient spring immediately seemed by no means spring-like -- is there anyone among us who has not heard of this man! I became acquainted with him at the opening of the Stockholm Conference (at first it was a press conference for all journalists, then the Swedish premier chatted for half an hour with the SOVETSKAYA ROSSIYA correspondent), and he still stands before my eyes just as he was 2 years ago: short, mobile, with a piercing look and a disarming smile. He spoke rapidly, with conviction and humor. What was the subject under discussion? About the fact that it is necessary to thrust back enmity and mistrust, and that human resources ought to be spent not on the arms race which in its very nature is immoral, but on the development of civilization. Now he is no more...

After all, the world had still not regained its composure after previous tragedy. The bullets with which Indira Gandhi was slain passed literally though the hearts of each of us. She fell but as she lay there she was shot a further 23 times.

Olof Palme and Indira Gandhi, John and Robert Kennedy, Salvador Allende, and Patrice Lumumba... They and many other outstanding people perished at the hands of terrorists.

Why then is this "trade" experiencing such a boom just now? Who is interested in terrorism flourishing so luxuriantly on our planet? Certain killers have not been found (including the criminal who shot Palme), it is not even always clear where the threads of any particular plot lead, but it is common knowledge who gambles mainly on force and who inspires and encourages terror in every way.

They Fashion Killers

Burning eyes and a knife held between bared, clenched teeth...STERN did not hold back, it published the countenance of one of the American terrorists over a full half-page. They are being trained at special schools across the ocean. Among other things, they are taught various methods of killing. Bullets and poison are hardly to the point: One has to know how to dispatch a person to the other world with the aid of screwdrivers, files, and other "nontraditional weapons"! The pupil needs also to be a butcher and he studies "interrogation methods."

A correspondent of Italy's L'EUROPEO magazine visited such an establishment in Georgia. High-voltage barbed wire lines the road. This is the school for mercenaries founded by General Mitchell (Uerbell).

The general, as they say, is an expert: He served for a long time with the CIA, put down an uprising in the Dominican Republic, and organized plots in Nicaragua and Guatemala. Every day at the school hand-to-hand fighting starts at dawn. Then it is the discipline termed "survival" -- the students eat raw everything that runs, jumps, or crawls.

The school is protected in every possible way. Local residents complain that they are kept awake at nights by bombs exploding and machine gun fire. But the authorities pretend not to hear the protests. The newspapers are silent about the "factory for killers." The police stop cars several kilometers away, stating that there is no through road and a "closed zone" is starting.

Cutthroats are trained not only in these establishments. They are also put through psychological training.

In Dallas, Texas, anyone who so wishes can participate in "star wars" for 3 dollars. You sit in a rocket with a bright light on your helmet. All around are enemies with "laser cannon" and "ray guns." The rocket starts up with a roar, the sirens wail, the guns fire...

When he is older, an American enters the real army. What does he encounter there? Listen to what Bob Jenkins, a 19-year-old Marine, told journalists:

"We just hear one word from morning to night: 'Kill!' They tell us it is our task to kill and it doesn't matter who, so long as we follow orders. When we are taught to use bayonets, everyone has to shout 'kill' while bayoneting the target. In the barracks, on the obstacle course, at the firing range, and during lectures it is drummed into us that we are killers." It is drummed into them. And they become killers.

The television in Bonn once showed an interview with Jenkins' colleagues -- Marines who had "conquered" tiny Grenada.

"I spotted two of them and let them have it," the first soldier said with obvious satisfaction. "It was really great how they rolled down the hill."

"Who were they?" the correspodent inquired.

"I don't know, probably communists."

The other soldier added: "Then we started taking everything we wanted from the communists' homes. And whatever we couldn't take we broke and smashed. Just like that. Yes, it was brilliant!"

Noticing the disapproval on the journalist's face, one of the servicemen exploded: "Don't you like what we're saying? Well we don't give a damn. The only thing that matters to us is what our President thinks. The U.S. President. Get it?"

Hearing the "liberators" cries on the screen and looking into their faces, one thought that these were not people but robots. Robots programmed for one thing only -- destruction.

They must be shown to the world. Their photographs must be published and movies must even be made. Because they are symbols of today's America. These "heroes" reflect the American way of life and American ideals much more accurately than the model Uncle Sam, Disney's Mickey Mouse, or the Statue of Liberty that is being overhauled... They are fashioned from childhood, working up hatred for everything humane in man. And they are fashioned with no effort or money stinted, for terrorism is a favorite instrument in U.S. policy, both domestic and foreign.

The Fist Rules Supreme

Itis used first and foremost against undesirables in the United States itself. The facts attest that the era of McCarthyism is by no means a thing of the past. Undesirables are dealt with in various ways. They are scared, thrown into jail, or hidden in psychiatric hospitals. But the most reliable measure of influence is the bullet. It is the bullet, as is well known, that has put a stop to the "affairs" of many black activists -- Martin Luther King, Malcolm X, Medgar Evers, George Jackson...

People with different ideas are combated by state departments (the police, the special services, and so forth), and by all types of extreme right-wing gangs. Gendarme outrages rub shoulders with terrorist outrages! The same tactics are used against undesirable countries and governments which they would like to pacify with the help of violence. Nicaragua, Angola... Merely to list them would fill the page.

They particularly brandish the big stick at the socialist states. In 1982 the U.S. President made a "historic speech," announcing a "crusade against communism." And recently on the banks of the Potomac a doctrine has emerged which, as it were, develops its precursor. It proclaims interference in the affairs of other countries to be long-term U.S. strategy. This is no big deal -- people overseas have long operated on the principle that the fist rules supreme. However, most often they have abandoned all secrecy.

The doctrine has a solid organizational basis -- that is American professionalism for you! The federal budget includes subsidies for "freedom-fighters" (the dushmans in Afghanistan, the "contras" in Nicaragua, the butchers in El Salvador, the invaders from Tel Aviv, and so on). Tactics for possible joint operations (between the United States and its allies) in the "Third World" have also been drawn up.

In general, for the sake of the "defense of U.S. interests," Washington has finally elevated terror to the rank of state policy.

But it is primarily the United States itself which has to pay for encouraging violence. "Imperialism has engendered the mass crime and terrorism that have swamped capitalist society," the new edition of the CPSU Program states. Overseas you can lose your life for any reason. For deciding to sit in the park one evening for instance.

And how dangerous it is to travel by car! The police persistently recommend that side windows should not be opened and that people should beware of anyone asking for help in a breakdown.

On arriving at a hotel, lock yourself in and carefully close the room's widnows and doors. Do not use the stairs -- muggers could be waiting. Take your valuables with you or they will disappear without trace.

Do not even relax for a second in your spare time. CBS TV organized a special series of lectures for those wanting to guard against bandits during their vacation.

Nonetheless, by placing violence on a broad footing, the United States itself cries: "Help! Murder!" tirelessly spreading the myth of Moscow's support for terrorists. But the real facts about this loathsome phenomenon, as Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev stressed at our recent party congress, cannot be covered up with any fabrications. Of course, nobody claims that the United States is behind each political crime. However, there is no doubt that a mighty factory of international terror does operate -- and with impunity -- across the ocean and is the source of the conveyer belt of violence that stretches over various continents.

PROPOSED AID TO CONTRAS DRAWS CRITICISM

Reagan Ignores Public's View

LD131132 Moscow Domestic Service in Russian 0930 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Igor Charikov commentary]

[Text] Speaking in the White House at a meeting with journalists, U.S. President Reagan was forced to admit that a majority of Americans do not support the policy of his administration regarding revolutionary Nicaragua. At the microphone is Igor Charikov.

Of late the President and his closest colleagues have increasingly often had to admit facts and phenomena that are unpleasant. A majority of those Americans that the public opinion institutes and services conventionally term as average, not only do not approve, but openly condemn, the foreign policy course of the White House. In this case we are talking about financing Nicaraguan terrorists, through whom the White House is trying to overthrow the legitimate government of Nicaragua. On Capitol Hill, President Reagan has not, contrary to his expectations, been met with complete and unconditional support for the request for the appropriation of $100 million to finance the contras. In short, the issue remains undecided, and time is passing.

On 31 March, the validity of the last bill on so-called humanitarain aid to the former Somozists -- worth $27 million -- expires. Thus it is perfectly understandable why the administration and the President personally are making feverish efforts to get the legislators to approve at any cost the fresh portion -- which incidentally, has been tripled -- of financial support to the counterrevolutionaries.

As for the ordinary, or average, as we said, Americans, their negative attitude to the idea of financing another regional adventure can be explained fairly simply: Nicaragua, they think, could become a second Vietnam. So what is motivating the congressmen, who are being stubborn and do not want to allocate $100 million to the former Somozistas? Here, too, it is not difficult to find the answer. On the one hand many of them also see in the policy of interference in Nicaragua the inglorious end of the Vietnam war, and on the other the legislators are behaving with such caution because of the mid-term elections to Congress in November. The House of Representatives and one-third of the Senate face reelection.

Nevertheless, the Reagan administration is obstinately ignoring U.S. public opinion. The aim it is pursuing must, in the words of Secretary of State Shultz, be attained at any cost. Revolutionary Nicaragua and its growing international prestige give no peace to the strategists of neoglobalism, which has been conceived to subject the peoples of independent states to their domination.

Habib Tour Viewed

LD131830 Moscow TASS International Service in Russian 0340 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] Washington, 13 Mar (TASS) -- P. Habib, the U.S. President's special representative, has left for a trip to the countries of the region: According to a White House report he will conduct negotiations with the presidents of El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and Costa Rica on the so-called "Nicaraguan issue."

This trip, which is undertaken at President Reagan's personal instruction, pursues a precise aim, namely of creating outward appearances of Washington being "deeply interested" in diplomatic settlement of the situation in the region, and thus trying to divert the attention of U.S. and world public from the aggressive plans of the United States concerning sovereign Nicaragua. It is precisely in the field of such operations that P. Habib is regarded as an expert. It suffices to recall that it was precisely him who, by his "shuttle diplomacy" in the Near East, ensured the covering up preparations for the Israeli invasion in Lebanon in 1982, which was carried out with the blessing of Washington. And recently Habib "excelled" in the Philippines, where he camouflaged the direct interference of the United States in the internal affairs of this country.

The President's special representative visits Central America at a time of critical importance for the White House: In the United States in general and in the Congress in particular, opposition to plans for drastic expansion of military aid for the bands of contras -- by whose hands Washington would like to overthrow Nicaragua's legal government -- is becoming stronger. In such a situation, P. Habib's mission is, according to the calculations of the administration, supposed to somewhat neutralize this opposition. It is perfectly clear, however, that Washington continues to bank on a military solution to the problems facing Central America. And it is not by chance that, as both Reagan himself and high-ranking representatives of the White House have given to understand, P. Habib "does not plan" to enter into direct dialogue with Nicaraguan representatives in the course of his trip.

U.S. 'EXTENDING INTERFERENCE' IN CHAD SITUATION

LD140106 Moscow TASS International Service in Russian 2128 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] Washington, 14 Mar (TASS) -- The Washington administration is extending its interference in the affairs of Chad. The State Department has announced that President Reagan has ordered $10 million worth of weapons, ammunition, and combat hardware to be earmarked for the Ndjamena regime out of Pentagon funds. Last week the United States handed over a C-130 military transport plane to the Chad regime. As is clear from the State Department announcement, the administration is coordinating operations to provide Ndjamena with military aid with the French Government, which earlier sent small military units in Chad.

CROCKER CITED ON U.S. SOUTH AFRICAN POLICY

LD131557 Moscow TASS in English 0901 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] Washington March 13 TASS -- The Republic of South Africa is now going through unprecedented political [illegible] economic difficulties, Chester Crocker, U.S. assistant secretary for African affairs, has admitted. Speaking Wednesday at hearings in a subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, he said that the recent more than one and a half years have witnessed a sharp escalation of violence in South Africa, in which 1,200 people were killed and another 11,000 arrested. The country is plagued with a chronic economic crisis which is manifest, in part, in inflation whose rate now hit almost 20 per cent and in huge foreign debt. At the same time, Crocker confirmed the administration's allegiance to the bankrupt policy of "constructive engagement" with the Republic of South Africa, a policy which was conducive to the outburst of popular outcry and the deep political crisis in the country. Crocker said that South Africa was a state friendly to the United States and the Reagan administration was committed to assisting it.

PRC PAPER CITED ON IMPROVING PARTY STYLE

LD132004 Moscow TASS in English 1542 GMT 13 86

[Text] Beijing March 13 TASS -- The Chinese press publishes materials dealing with the task of "improving the party style".

The newspaper JINGJI RIBAO writes that the "solution of the problem of the party style is of vital importance for the Communist Party of China. The future of the country depends on it". The newspaper's commentary emphasizes that the governing party and adminsitrative bodies, the judicial bodies and the organizations that control discipline should "realize the importance and topicality of improving the party style".

"Problems existing in the sphere of the party style and public morality are connected not only with a decade of the 'Cultural Revolution', but also with the fact that in new historical conditions the demoralizing feudal and bourgeois ideology and a style of work have penetrated our revolutionary mentality", the newpaper writes. "Isn't it true that red tape, abuse of power, speculation, corruption, low morality and other unseemly phenomena are an ordinary thing in the feudal and bourgeois societies? We are not living in vacuum. The 'four modernizations' program cannot be implemented behind closed doors either. This is why the influence of the ideology of the exploiting classes can be felt for a long time to come".

PRC ECONOMIST CITED ON CADRE TRAINING ISSUE

PM131239 Moscow TRUD in Russian 12 Mar 86 p 3

[TASS report: "China Problems of Cadre Training"]

[Text] Beijing, 11 Mar -- In an article published in the newspaper RENMIN RIBAO, Yuan Baohua, the well-known Chinese economist and deputy chairman of the State Economic Committee, points to the importance of raising the standard of the general educational and vocational training of national economic workers. Of the more than 90 million people employed in sectors of the national economy, approximately 70 percent are less than 35 years old. For various historical reasons, the article points out, there are many flaws in the existing system for training workers and employees in China.

In the last 5-year plan more than 4.7 million leading workers of industrial, transport, financial, and trade enterprises mastered the fundamentals of managerial science. During those years approximately 1 million graduates of the country's higher and secondary specialized educational institutions entered production -- which, according to Yuan Baohua, made it possible to reduce to a certain extent the shortage of skilled manpower at enterprises, particularly at medium and small enterprises.

At present, however, Yuan Baohua writes, there is still a tremendous discrepancy between the new requirements and the present makeup of workers and employees. According to him, "leaders of enterprises everywhere lack knowledge in the sphere of management and administration," "there is still a shortage of engineering and technical personnel," "the detachment of specialists is extremely weak and, moreover, a situation has taken shape whereby the old harvest (that is, previously trained cadres) is on the way out, while the new one is still waiting to be reaped," "there is a shortage of highly skilled workers," "a section of workers and employees has only a vague idea about moral ideals and discipline, and corrupt bourgeois ideology has to a certain extent spread among them."

During the implementation of the Seventh 5-Year Plan (1986-1990), the author of the article believes, China needs not only to train a large number of leaders who "know production and know how to manage" but also, and to a considerable extent, to enhance the ideological and political awareness, the level of scientific and cultural knowledge, and also the qualifications of the country's entire detachment of workers and employees.

[TASS report: "China's Highways"]

[Text] Beijing, 10 Mar -- In the course of the current 5-year plan (1985-1990) China plans to build and reconstruct 60,000 km of highways, including 27,000 km of main highways. This was reported by the XINHUA agency, citing a statement by Wang Zhanyi, minister of communications [title as published].

The Chinese minister noted that emphasis will be laid on the construction of new highways linking economic regions with port cities, and also roads intended for intensive transportation of energy raw materials. The new motor highways planned for construction and reconstruction include the Beijing-Tianjin-Tanggu, Beijing-Shenyang, Shenyang-Daliang, Shenyang-Harbin, Shanghai-Nanjing and Canton-Zhuhai highways, the beltway in the eastern part of Hainan Island, and others. It also planned to build road bridges: over the Huanghe River near Zhengzhou City and over the Songhua River near Harbin.

ENVOY TO JAPAN DENIES SMUGGLING CHARGES

OW140945 Tokyo KYODO in English 0940 GMT 14 Mar 86

[Excerpts] Tokyo, March 14 KYODO -- Soviet Ambassador to Japan Petr Abrasimov, during a rare news conference, denied allegations Friday that he was arrested at Moscow airport for smuggling electronic products.

The allegations, carried in a West German newspaper (BILD AM SONNTAG), "are totally untrue and a provocation," he said during the news conference he called to comment on the recent 27th Soviet Communist Party Congress. The West German daily reported that Abrasimov was apprehended at the airport as he tried to smuggle 29 electronic products into the country from Japan.

A veteran diplomat who previously served as ambassador to Poland, East Germany and France, Absrasimov, 73, casually hinted he may leave Tokyo, possibly after April. "It's not going to take place today or tomorrow -- or March or April," the silver-haired ambassador responded when asked about the timing of his departure from the Tokyo post that he has held since March last year. He is the ninth Soviet envoy since the restoration of diplomatic relations between Tokyo and Moscow in 1956. "I am just a soldier of the Communist Party," Abrasimov said, adding that he will continue to work and has no plans to live on pension even if he returns to Moscow.

An interpreter made a 15-minute speech on the outcome of the party congress on behalf of Ambassador Abrasimov prior to a question and answer session.

'WORSENING SITUATION' IN SOUTH KOREA VIEWED

OW131331 Moscow Televsion Service in Russian 1115 GMT 13 Mar 86

[From "The World Today" program presented by B. Myakota]

[Text] The situation is getting worse and worse in South Korea. Despite cruel repression by the authorities in the country, they cannot manage to hold back of the movement for democratic reforms. The opposition is retaliating to indiscriminate searches and arrests by the secret police with new demonstrations.

The enemies of the pro-U.S. regime of Chon Tu-hwan have called for the revision of the draconian constitution and the holding of direct democratic presidential elections in the country. Leading opposition organizations in South Korea favor profound changes, the liberation of all political detainees, and the guaranteeing of freedom of speech.

Reports leaked to the foreign press say that the worsening situation in the south of the Korean peninsula is arousing concern in Washington. The anti-people Seoul regime is one of its main allies in the Far East. The Pentagon has announced that the annual U.S.-South Korean meeting on so-called security issues will be held in Seoul at the beginning of April. Although the meeting agenda has not been announced, it is assumed that the issue of expanding U.S.-South Korean military cooperation will be discussed.

DRA PREMIER WRITES ON REGIME'S GROWING STRENGTH

PM131444 Moscow IZVESTIYA in Russian 13 Mar 86 Morning Edition p 5

[Article by Soltan Ali Keshtmand, member of the PDPA Central Committee Politburo and chairman of the DRA Council of Ministers: "Along the Path of Struggle and Creation"]

[Text] Kabul -- The national-democratic revolution accomplished in Afghanistan under the PDPA's leadership in April 1978, which was an expression of the will of the broad masses, was the law-governed result of Afghan society's long development and of the change in the correlation of forces in the international arena to the benefit of peace, national independence, democracy, and social progress. It opened a new page in the country's history.

The gradual overcoming of economic and social backwardness is the core of the policy pursued by the party and the DRA Government. The republic inherited a grim legacy from the time of the monarchy. As is well known, Afghanistan's economy developed extremely unevenly in the past.

It must be noted that, had it not been for the Soviet Union's economic aid in the prerevolutionary years, Afghanistan would have been at an even lower level of development and would have remained dependent on imperialism for many years. The Soviet Union's proximity enabled Afghanistan to take advantage of the fruits of economic and technical cooperation with a developed socialist country.

Large and complex tasks face the party and the revolutionary power today: to implement the land and water reform, to boost industrial and agricultural production, to develop the main sectors of the national economy, to expand the state, mixed, cooperative, and private sectors, to strengthen the alliance of the working class and the peasantry and simultaneously to involve all patriotic forces in state affairs.

In comparison with the prerevolutionary years, a considerable growth of production was achieved in various sectors of the economy following the onset of the new stage of the revolution. The volume of gross output increased approximately 14 percent, and national income increased 11 percent. Growth is 5 percent in the sphere of agricultural production and about 28 percent in industrial production.

The revolution made it possible to implement broad social programs. The public education and health care system is being improved, and illiteracy is being successfully eliminated. National cadres are being trained in more than 100 economic sectors. Thirty-six newspapers and 48 journals are published in the republic.

The socialist states, and primarily the Soviet Union, provide great help in the implementation of our economic programs. More than 100 projects playing a decisive role in the strengthening and development of the country's economy have been built in Afghanistan with the USSR's all-around assistance since 1950. Three-fifths of the modern concrete or asphalt highways were built with the Soviet Union's help. More than 90,000 specialists and skilled workers have been trained at Soviet-Afghan cooperation projects, in the USSR, and at education establishments built in Afghanistan with the Soviet Union's assistance.

The USSR and Afghanistan conduct traditional mutually advantageous trade. It is an integral part of Soviet-Afghan cooperation and its growth rate is accelerating. Commodity exchange with the USSR accounts for about 65 percent of the DRA's foreign trade turnover.

Following the April Revolution, the DRA was subjected to aggression by imperialism and regional reaction. When a serious threat to the republic's territorial integrity and very existence arose, the Soviet Union, at the DRA's request, rendered invaluable international assistance to Afghanistan's revolutionary people.

The undeclared war against the DRA waged by world reaction headed by the United States has inflicted great damage on our country's economy. The losses caused by the subversive activity of counterrevolutionary gangs, which the imperialists train, arm, and send into Afghanistan, has already reached 36 billion afghanis. More than 2,000 schools, 38 hospitals, over one-half of medical centers, 254 mosques, 14,000 km of telephone lines linking the country's provinces and regions, and 50 percent of power transmission lines have been destroyed during the years of the war.

Between 1980 and 1985 the imperialist states, primarily the United States, openly or secretly gave more than 1.5 billion dollars to the counterrevolutionary gangs. It became known recently that the U.S. Congress has appropriated an additional sum of 300 million dollars for the Afghan counterrevolution via the CIA. The United States has decided to appropriate 600 million dollars for the expansion of subversive activity against the DRA in 1986. The counterrevolutionary organizations have received 200 million dollars from Saudi Arabia, Israel, and China, 62 million dollars from Japan, 18 million pounds sterling from Britain, and 20 million dollars from the FRG.

Any unbiased person can see that under these circumstances the presence of the limited contingent of Soviet forces is vitally important for Afghanistan and guarantees the maintenance of our country's independence, its territorial integrity and national sovereignty, and the Afghan people's freedom. The whole world knows that the Soviet forces will be withdrawn from Afghanistan when there is an end to the armed interference in the DRA's internal affairs and when reliable guarantees are given regarding the nonresumption of aggression.

The Afghan and Soviet peoples are now blood brothers. There is no force capable of breaking this brotherhood. The time-tested Afghan-Soviet friendship has been raised to a qualitatively new level following the April national democratic revolution, has been enriched, and has become the Afghan people's most valuable asset. I will note once more that for our people friendship with the Soviet Union is not just a glorious historical tradition and guarantee of economic progress, but also a vitally important necessity.

The improvement of the domestic political situation in the country will enable us to look into the future with confidence and to elaborate precise plans for our long-term development. We have elaborated basic guidelines for the DRA's economic and social development in 1986-1990. They lay down the main tasks, pace, and proportions of development in various sectors of the national economy in the next 5-year period, and also the ways and means to attain them.

The 1986-1990 plans envisage an acceleration of the country's economic and social development and an increase in the volume of industrial output.

Considerable attention will be paid to the development of sectors like agriculture and irrigation. It is planned to increase capital investments in these sectors by 70 percent. It is planned to accelerate the development of health care, enlightenment, education, science, and culture.

The profound socioeconomic transformations taking place in the country give the DRA citizens faith in the future. The policy of the party and the government enjoys the support of the broad people's masses, including the clergy and business circles.

This makes it possible to considerably expand the social base of the revolution. Elections to local organs of state power and management have been held successfully in a number of provinces. It was primarily the candidates of the National Fatherland Front, which unites all mass public organizations in the country and all national progressive and patriotic forces in its ranks, who were elected to provincial, city, country, district, and village councils during the election campaign, which was notable for its democratic spirit.

The traditional Loya Jirga -- the Afghan people's supreme assembly -- and the Supreme Jirga of border tribes were convened for the purpose of expanding the social base of the revolution and further rallying the DRA citizens around the party and the revolutionary government. Nonparty representatives of all strata and groups of the population who enjoy the people's respect and trust are now entering the supreme state bodies and local organs of power. The structure of the Revolutionary Council, the government, and other state institutions has been expanded on this basis. As a result of measures implemented recently, the participation of national private capital in the country's economy has increased.

Afghanistan's heroic people, who are fighting against imperialist aggression, need peace and security above all else. We profoundly cherish and understand the ideas contained in the CPSU Central Committee Political Report, delivered at the 27th Congress of Soviet Communists by Comrade M.S. Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee. This outstanding document, which contains specific peace proposals on a global scale, is a detailed program of the Soviet Union's foreign policy initiatives. It is not without reason that it has received such powerful support from all honest people on the planet, who perceived it as an inspiring source of hope.

The Afghan people are at a sharp and important turning point in their fate. Revolutionary building in the DRA, overcoming the difficulties caused by the undeclared war, is gathering strength and pace. The country's working people and all citizens are rallying around the PDPA and the government. Afghan society's consolidation is becoming the determining factor in our reality, and today no one must have any doubts that the ideals of the republic will be realized.

TASS CITES BAKHTAR ON ABDUL HAQ'S VISIT TO UK

LD132030 Moscow TASS in English 1817 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] Kabul March 13 TASS -- The reception of Afghan counter-revolutionary chieftain Abdul Haq in London by British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and Foreign Secretary Geoffrey Howe has elevated the trip by the terrorist and cutthroat nearly up to the level of an official visit, BAKHTAR news agency reports today.

The British leaders openly encouraged Abdul Haq to continue "resistance" to the legitimate Afghan Government, thus showing the anti-Afghan orientation of Britain's foreign policy, the news agency observes.

London is welcoming the person guilty of causing the death of people during an explosion at Kabul airport, participating in an open armed revolt against the government of a country with which Britain maintains diplomatic relations. The strange "hospitality" has sparked off protests in Britain, including on the part of many political figures, BAKHTAR writes.

The news agency stresses that the British ruling circles in their policy with regard to Afghanistan are joining force with the American Administration which sticks to an anti-Afghan course.

The Australian Government believes that military operations cannot resolve the problems of Central America, Senator Garret Evans, who represents the Australian foreign minister in the upper chamber of the Federal Parliament, told the Senate. He stressed that the contras were known for their ruthlessness and atrocities and said that there was no reason to believe that they championed democracy.

NEW ZEALAND'S LANGE ON SINKING OF SOVIET LINER

LD101115 Moscow TASS in English 1103 GMT 10 Mar 86

[Text] London March 10 TASS -- The reason why New Zealand pilot Don Jamison decided to take the Soviet liner Mikhail Lermontov through a narrow passage where it sank after hitting rocks is "unaccountable," New Zealand's Prime Minister David Lange is quoted by REUTER news agency as saying to journalists in Wellington today. The official commission which investigated the sinking of the Soviet liner came to the conclusion that the pilot made "a sudden decision" to navigate the ship through the passage, too shallow for vessels of that class, without reference to charts or anyone else on board. The pilot admitted during the inquiry that he took the decision on the spur of the moment. Jamison "voluntarily" surrendered his pilot's licence last Thursday. The New Zealand prime minister observed that the pilot's motive was "an unfortunate gap" in the government report into the sinking of the Mikhail Lermontov, and stressed that it should be made public.

PHILIPPINES' AQUINO FREEZES MARCOS' ACCOUNTS

[Text] Manila March 13 TASS -- The new Government of the Philippines held its first meeting here with President Corazon Aquino in the chair. It decided to establish a committee headed by Minister of Justice N. Gonzales who is to consider the constitutional and legal status of the new government. The point at issue is a radical revision of the system established by the former administration of Ferdinand Marcos, said a government spokesman. Another committee was set up to deal with preparations for local government elections. The meeting also discussed certain economic problems, specifically the possibility of cutting the prices of prime necessaries.

New York March 13 TASS -- According to THE NEW YORK TIMES President Aquino has ordered the freezing of all bank acounts of Ferdinand Marcos, his relatives and closest supporters. She urged the governments of other countries to take similar steps in order to find out and freeze the deposits of the former president of the Philippines. The newspaper says that Marcos and members of his family had illegally amassed a fortune estimated, at least, at 5 billion dollars. To this day supporters of Marcos own or control most Philippine banks, a number of big companies and considerable portions of the most profitable industries.

London March 13 TASS -- The Government of the Philippines has reliable information indicating that Marcos has contributed several million dollars to the campaign fund of U.S. President R. Reagan and Vice President George Bush, says the FINANCIAL TIMES. This may complicate the situation now that the government of President Aquino is trying to retrieve the funds illegally appropriated by the Marcos family and the closest aides of the former president. They live now in the American state of Hawaii.

BOVIN PONDERS U.S. VIEW OF PHILIPPINE EVENTS

PM131030 Moscow NEDELYA in Russian No 10, 3-9 Mar 86 (Signed to Press 6 Mar 86) p 11

[Aleksandr Bovin article under the rubric "The Planet's Hot Spots": "Events in the Philippines"]

[Text] A change of power has occurred in the Philippines following fierce clashes, demonstrations, counterdemonstrations, and a rebellion by the Army top brass, all of which had brought the country to the brink of civil war. Ferdinand Marcos left the country early in the morning of 25 February. Corazon Aquino took over as head of state. The class and social nature of political power remained unchanged. There has been a regrouping of forces within the Philippines bourgeoisie, pushing to the top its most dynamic faction.

The changes were not unexpected. The 2 decades of authoritarian rule had led the Philippines into a blind alley. The country was in turmoil as a result of armed struggle waged by left-wing antigovernment movements (the "New People's Army") and by Muslim insurgents (the Moro National Liberation Front). Relations between the ruling circles and the opposition demanding the establishment of a bourgeois-democratic regime had deteriorated sharply. The economic crisis had intensified (inflation, unemployment, annual decline of gross national product, and foreign debts approaching $30 billion). No one felt happy, neither the rulers nor the ruled. Some demanded changes, other promised them, everyone expected them.

The tension of the battles preceding the early presidential elections was, therefore, understandable. Over 100 people were killed. A group of international observers -- 44 people from 19 countries -- noted numerous instances of fraud, buying of votes, forgery of ballot papers, and theft of ballot boxes. Even so, the opposition was hot on the president's heels. "Though he had money and power," Japan's ASAHI wrote, Marcos "relied on the Army and the police, and had scheduled the elections to suit his own convenience, he was nevertheless only a hairbreadth from failure."

The National Assembly proclaimed Marcos the winner of the election. In an attempt to stabilize the situation, he offered "a hand of friendship" to his rival. But Corazon Aquino remained adament. She declared Marcos to be a "self-styled president" and called on Filipinos to "besiege the presidential palace around the clock with rallies and demonstrations" and to launch a campaign of "civil disobedience."

The pretender to the presidency asked a number of West European countries and Japan to refrain from recongizing Marcos as president. She stressed in an interview with the French newspaper LIBERATION: "Marcos is finished. He can still threaten and strike blows, but he is no longer capable of ruling the country." Aquino called on Ronald Reagan not to "conspire" with Marcos to deprive the Philippine people of freedom.

Aquino's stance was actively supported by many Catholic bishops, who called for the launch of a nonviolent "struggle for justice."

In response, Marcos promised to take resolute measures to maintain law and order. It was, however, already too late...

Attitudes toward Marcos and the nature and results of his activity may differ. One point is indisputable. The events which have occurred and are occurring in the Philippines are a matter for the Filipinos themselves. But Washington does not seem to grasp this at all. It is still thinking in terms of the colonial past.

The United States "inherited" the Philippines under the Paris Treaty, which marked the end of the Spanish-American War on 10 December 1898. That was the first war of the imperialist epoch, a war to redivide a world that had already been shared out. America was stronger than Spain, and seized the Philippines from it. With the most noble of intentions, of course. These intentions were described to his friends by McKinley, chief of the White House at the time: "Every evening I pace the White House until midnight and -- I am not ashamed to admit it, gentlemen -- many a time I have knelt and asked the Almighty for illumination and guidance. One night the following ideas came into my head, I myself do not know how:

"1) We cannot return the Philippine Islands to Spain -- this would be a cowardly and dishonorable act;

"2) We cannot hand over the Philippines to France or Germany, our commercial competitors in the east -- this would be a bad and economically disadvantageous policy;

"3) We cannot leave the Filipinos to themselves because they are not ready for self-government, and Philippine independence would lead to abuses which would be worse than the Spanish War;

"4) There is nothing left for us to do but to take over all the Philippine Islands, educate, elevate, and civilize the Filipinos, and foster Christian ideals in them because they are our fellow men and Christ died for them too.

"After this I went to bed and slept soundly."

For some reason or other the Filipinos resisted the "education" and began a war against the new colonialists. The methods which were used to foster "Christian ideals" can be seen in an order issued by General James Smith, who put down a rising on Samar Island. "I want no prisoners. I want you," the general addressed his soldiers, "to kill and burn, and the more you kill the better I will be pleased." This was the beginning of the U.S. civilizing mission in the Philippines.

Times changed. Washington recognized the sovereignty of the Republic of the Philippines 4 July 1946. The Americans formally departed. In fact, they stayed on. An agreement was signed in 1947 on the creation of a naval base in Subic Bay and an Air Force at Clark Field. But it is not just the bases that are at issue. For almost 40 years Washington had every reason to regard any Philippine Government as a reliable guardian and defender of U.S. interests. In order to be a reliable guardian and defender, however, you need at least to be firmly in power and in control of the situation in the country. Suddenly President Marcos started making Washington anxious in this respect. Hence the chill between Washington and Manila.

Let us examine this issue as interpreted by THE NEW YORK TIMES. No matter what happens in the future in the Philippines and Haiti, the newspaper claimed, "the position of dictators is undermined and America is their scourge. Long live President Reagan!" THE NEW YORK TIMES was, no doubt, being ironic when hailing Reagan. But there is more to it than that.

"It cannot be ruled out," the newspaper went on, "that President Marcos may attempt to hang on at all costs, thus complicating a return to democracy as much as possible. But, by abandoning its praise for him and finally criticizing his bloody methods, the administration forced Marcos to hold elections and revived the democratic opposition. In Haiti, meanwhile, vigorous U.S. diplomacy obviously hastened the flight of the 'president for life.' His replacement by a provisional government which has promised to hold the first free elections in the country for 29 years is beginning to compensate for the shameful decades of U.S. unconcern and indifference." In conclusion, the newspaper noted a "radical turnabout" in the policy of the administration, which is now "standing up for democracy."

If the calculations of THE NEW YORK TIMES are to be believed, it should be admitted that "democracy" for the U.S. Administration means everything that makes it possible to maintain a U.S. political and military presence. "I know of nothing more important than the Philippine bases," Reagan declared. There is, therefore, good reasons to stand up for democracy in the Philippines.

The "Iranian syndrome" is also clearly operating. The Americans fear that they may be chased out. This is why they maneuver, select different options, and try different approaches. On one hand, they pressured Marcos: Implement reforms, otherwise things will go badly and dissatisfaction may get out of control. On the other hand, they maintained contacts with the opposition, striving to enlist its support just in case.

Obviously, a Marcos victory with a subsequent amendment to his policy and moderate democratization of his regime would have suited the White House perfectly well. And Reagan's initial statements following the election were indeed assessed as support for Marcos and thus as a promise to continue military and economic aid for the Philippines (about $180 million a year).

"What is President Reagan up to with his policy regarding the Philippines?" THE WASHINGTON POST asked. "Only 10 days ago he openly stated the paramount importance of the elections and made aid conditional on honesty in the elections. Yesterday the President abandoned the fine phrases... He brushed aside claims of fraud and declared that the opposition could try its luck another time, giving the impression that no major changes have occurred in relations between the United States and the Philippines."

The expression of sympathy for the President caused growing dissatisfaction in Congress, which obviously intended to distance itself from Marcos. "A temporary suspension of aid," Dante Fascell, chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, said, "is a sensible and necessary step, bearing in mind the inevitable damage the United States will suffer unless if dissociates itself from the regime, which has obviously decided to stay in power regardless of the consequences, which will be an undermining of the democratic process and the people's will." And Congressman Jim Leach added: "I think that we must send for Marcos the same aircraft we sent last week for 'Baby Doc.'"

So as not to ruffle too many feathers, Reagan "distanced" himself from Marcos. At the same time, the White House started talking about the prospects of a "two-party system" in the Philippines, calling on Marcos and Aquino not to quarrel; to implement reforms together; and to work together "for the sake of national unity."

But Congress continued to build up the pressure. The Senate passed by 85 votes to 9 a resolution which pointed out that the presidential elections in the Philippines were "marked by such large-scale abuses that they cannot be perceived as a fair reflection of the Philippine people's will." The resolution asked Reagan "to personally notify Marcos of this opinion."

The administration resisted. Insisting on the continuation of the program of military aid to Marcos, U.S. Defense Secretary C. Weinberger threatened the congressmen with the prospects of victory by "communist insurgents." It can be confidently said that these insurgents "will continue to inexorably seek power." Ultimately, they alone will gain from a postponement and reduction of the military aid program. And this, the secretary concluded, is "an outcome that we cannot support."

In order to possibly prevent a turn of events which could be dangerous for the United States, Reagan sent P. Habib, veteran of the U.S. diplomatic service, to the Philippines. Habib's task, as far as I understand, was to reconcile the rivals. It was not to be. Marcos had to be evacuated in a hurry.

Now the White House would like to forget (and make others forget) that for years on end it was the Americans who kept Marcos afloat, that it was the Americans who tried to "correct" Marcos but definitely keep him, and that it was the Americans who strove to prevent Aquino from coming to power. Now the White House "stands up" for both Aquino and democracy. But Washington is not concerned with democracy. Actually, the new president is viewed with great suspicion there. Washington is concerned with maintaining U.S. influence and presence. The question of who will actually ensure that this influence and presence are not shaken is only a secondary issue.

News reports arriving from Manila testify that the establishment of the new political regime is not going easily. Supporters of the former president occupy quite strong positions and will hardly give them up without resistance. Contradictions and conflicts are beginning to develop in the camp of the victors. So far, relations between the government and the political left are unclear. Pressure is still exerted by the United States, which is striving to prevent sharp changes and to maintain its role of senior partner. Nor will the Americans miss the chance to play on the anti-Soviet sentiments which prevail among a certain section of the new ruling group.

Be that as it may, people in the Philippines are welcoming the spring with hope...

LOMEYKO PREVIEWS SHEVARDNADZE VISIT TO POLAND

LD140119 Warsaw Domestic Service in Polish 2210 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] As you will recall, ladies and gentlemen, today's press advised that Eduard Shevardnadze, the Soviet Union's foreign minister, is to visit Poland in the second half of March on the invitation of our government. This matter was also raised today in Moscow. Here is our correspondent in the Soviet capital, Erazm Fethke.

The announcement of the visit of Poland by Eduard Shevardnadze, Soviet foreign minister and CPSU Central Committee member, has met with universal interest here. It is emphasized that the visit will be of the utmost importance, as was made known today by representatives of the Soviet Foreign Ministry, the intergovernmental Soviet-Polish Mixed Commission for Economic and Scientific-Technological Cooperation, and the Ministry of Foreign Trade during a special meeting with a group of Polish journalists. In his opening address, Vladimir Lomeyko, director of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs' Press Department, emphasized, among other things:

[Begin Lomeyko recording in Russian with superimposed Polish translation] Great political significance is being attached within the Soviet Union to the visit to Poland by Eduard Shevardnadze, Politburo member and foreign minister. This stems from the character and spirit of fraternal, close relations between our parties and states. This visit has specific, possibly symbolic significance as the first visit after the conclusion of the 27th CPSU Congress, and we are all the more pleased that it is taking place in Poland.

We are also pleased with the atmosphere prevailing during the congress between the PZPR delegation under the chairmanship of Wojciech Jaruzelski and our own party's leadership. The meeting which took place between Mikhail Gorbachev, general secretary of our party, and Comrade Jaruzelski confirmed yet again the complete unity of our parties and states, both in the assessment of bilateral relations and in the assessment of international relations and the world situation. We regard it as extremely important that once again the fraternal friendship and solidarity of our parties and states have been demonstrated. This has fundamental significance in times of confrontation between the socialist forces of peace and progress on the one hand, and the forces of imperialism and reaction on the the other. It is clear that the main defense of progressive forces in this confrontation is the community of socialist states.

During the forthcoming visit, the two ministers will exchange views on a number of issues concerning bilateral relations and the international situation. They will discuss new issues, among others those stemming from the results of the CPSU Congress. All this will serve to aid continued, closer mutual cooperation and the consolidation of our solidarity in the international arena. [end recording]

PZPR POLITBURO NOTES IMPORTANCE OF CPSU CONGRESS

LD131435 Moscow TASS in English 1101 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] Warsaw March 13 TASS -- The Political Bureau of the Central Committee of the Polish Workers' Party, meeting here, stressed the historic importance of the 27th Congress of the CPSU for the USSR, the international communist and working class movement and the destinies of all mankind. The Politbureau approved a report of the PUWP delegation which attended the congress.

The congress results, says an announcement on this meeting, represent a creative contribution to the development of the theory of Marxism-Leninism and the practical work of building socialism. They will be of special importance to the PUWP in its efforts to settle the problems of building socialism, strengthen and deepen the processes of social renovation.

The CPSU congress confirmed, the announcement says, that the main goal of the CPSU's and the Soviet state's policy is to ensure peace and peaceful conditions for the life and work of the Soviet people. This is also the aim behind the comprehensive program for the elimination of nuclear and chemical weapons before the end of this century and for delivering mankind from the threat of nuclear annihilation, set forth by General Secretary of the CPSU Central Committee Mikhail Gorbachev.

Jaruzelski Dinner Speech

PM131120 Vilnius SOVETSKAYA LITVA in Russian 1 Mar 86 pp 1,2

[ELTA report on speech by Wojciech Jaruzelski, first secretary of the PZPR Central Committee and chairman of the Polish Council of State, at luncheon in honor of the PZPR delegation to the 27th CPSU Congress in Vilnius on 28 February]

[Text] Dear Comrades and Friends! I want to express heartfelt thanks to the Lithuanian Communist Party Central Committee, the Lithuanian SSR Supreme Soviet Presidium, the republican government, and you personally, dear Comrade Grishkyavichus, for the invitation to visit your republic and Vilnius, its wonderful and historical capital, and also for the hospitality and cordiality accorded to us.

The fates of our peoples are closely interwoven. Evidence of this is contained in the words of the poet Adam Mickiewicz, who is close to the hearts of both Poles and Lithuanians:

"It can so happen that the worst of neighbors,
Having inherited the law of enmity,
Lithuanians and Poles, drink from a common goblet,
Spend time in friendly conversation,
Then pass the night together and share the tasks of war."

More than 5 and 1/2 centuries ago Poles, Lithuanians, and Russians fought the Teutonic conquerors together in the battle of Grunwald. The centuries-old history of Polish-Lithuanian ties contains wonderful and important pages. They list the names of great patriots, outstanding creators, and subsequently revolutionaries from the two peoples. There have also been quarrels and insults, as well as class and national oppression. It is well known that Poland's propertied classes played a particularly negative role in this. We have extirpated forever this bitter legacy.

The victory of people's power in Poland and Lithuania, the ideological unity and common goals in socialist building, and the international policy of our Marxist-Leninist parties have written a qualitatively new page in the history of our relations.

The friendly alliance between People's Poland and the USSR has flourished and strengthened for more than 4 decades now. Bonds of friendship link the Polish People's Republic and the Lithuanian SSR, and good-neighborly cooperation is expanding.

We are gratified by the Lithuanian SSR's successes in all spheres. They are the result of your people's selfless labor, and credit for them is due to the wise policy of the Lithuanian Communist Party -- a firm link of the CPSU. Your republic has become a country with highly developed industry and agriculture. It makes its weighty contribution to development in many spheres of the Soviet Union's national economy, technology, science, and culture. We sincerely congratulate you on these successes.

Esteemed Comrades! Our meeting is taking place at the time of the work of the 27th CPSU Congress. We listened with great attention to the Political Report by Comrade M.S. Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, at the congress. We are extremely impressed by the high ideological standards, cordiality, and principledness of this historic forum.

The landmarks outlined in the new edition of the Party Program are impressive and essentially new. We observe with comradely interest the changes that are occurring in the Soviet Union and in the life of its peoples, who have entered a new stage on the socialist path and are shifting the economy onto the tracks of intensive development. Embarking on this great work, the CPSU is invariably guided by the fundamentals of Marxist-Leninist science, which are fully confirmed by practice.

Esteemed Comrades! Major changes are occurring in Poland now. The program for the strengthening of socialism adopted at the extraordinary Ninth PZPR Congress and the policy of the socialist rebirth of the country's political, social, and economic life are being implemented step by step.

We are confidently repairing the damage suffered as a result of disruptions in socioeconomic life. Even though these consequences can still be felt, the nature of the difficulties has now changed substantially. We are setting ourselves the goal of accelerating the pace of development by enhancing the efficiency of economic management and primarily the role of science and technology.

The party's strength is growing, and the working people's trust in its policy and in the people's power is also growing. Proof of this was provided particularly by the recent Sejm elections in People's Poland.

Preparations have begun for the 10th PZPR Congress. It will evaluate the path that has been traveled and will map out a program for socialist Poland's development through the end of this century.

Much was achieved in the last few years toward the goal of normalizing the country's political and economic life. This was done with the help of the Soviet Union in solving our difficult problems, and thanks to the close and stable cooperation between our countries.

I would like to emphasize in particular your republic's role in overall Polish-Soviet cooperation. We highly appreciate the products of your electrical engineering and electronic industries. A wide range of goods are exported from Poland to Soviet Lithuania. Cultural cooperation is constantly expanding, as are the ties in the sphere of science and technology. We note with satisfaction the constantly deepening ties between border regions. Friendly contacts between representatives of our peoples -- workers and peasants, cultural and scientific workers, and young people -- are strengthening. We intend to continue to expand and enrich our cooperation.

Your party's Leninist nationalities policy, your internationalist attitude toward citizens of Polish nationality, who can study and enjoy cultural riches in their native tongue, and the preservation of traditions of the past and safekeeping of our peoples' common monuments all deserve the most profound respect.

Dear Comrades and Friends! I want to thank you again for the fraternal reception, for the opportunity we have been given to visit places that are so close to the Polish heart, and for the contacts and meetings.

Long live the constant and close cooperation between the PZPR and the CPSU and between the Polish People's Republic and the USSR! Long live the Lithuanian Communist Party and the Lithuanian SSR! Long live the friendship and cooperation between our peoples in the cause of strengthening peace and international security!

SPAIN'S NATO REFERENDUM RESULT VIEWED

LD131738 Moscow TASS in English 1425 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow March 13 TASS -- TASS political news analyst Anatoliy Krasikov writes: Spain has followed the example which was given by General Charles de Gaulle twenty years ago. It decided to retain its membership in the North Atlantic alliance but not to subordinate its Armed Forces to the NATO integrated military command.

This is the meaning of the official stand of that country with regard to the bloc of states put together by the United States in 1949, the stand which was approved in the nationwide referendum on March 12.

A curious detail is noteworthy: If the withdrawal of France from the integrated military structure of NATO in 1966 was received by Washington with undisguised irritation and, moreover, with hostility, the results of the referendum in Spain made those across the ocean to sigh with relief. In the meantime, there is nothing strange in this. Something more was put at stake for the Atlanticists this time than just participation or non-participation of one of the West European countries in the NATO allied armed forces which are under the command of the U.S. general. [as received] The question was put differently: Either Spain stays outside the allied military structure or it breaks away with the North Atlantic block altogether.

In its report on the vote results the Spanish news agency EFE pointed out that the victory by the Felipe Gonzalez government which campaigned for the first of the two variants differed from all forecasts, as numerous public opinion polls conducted during the pre-referendum campaign showed the opposite. The results of these polls sparked serious concern of Washington. In these circumstances, according to the same news agency, a White House official spokesman reacted to the latest news from Madrid by describing it as fantastic and fine.

It is so far not clear whether the Spanish Government will take a step which France considered at one time as the logical consequence of the decision to pull out of the NATO integrated military structure -- to withdraw completely the U.S. servicemen stationed on its national territory. By the way, it is known that Gonzalez' consent to continued membership in the North Atlantic alliance was made conditional on reducing U.S. military personnel in Spain along with renouncing military integration into NATO and preserving Spain's non-nuclear status won back under Adolfo Suarez in 1979.

The United States has been seeking to draw Spain into its military orbit since that same moment when it embarked on the course of knocking together a coalition for war against the Soviet Union. In 1953, the United States concluded an agreement with the Franco fascist regime, under which in exchange for aid to the regime it secured the right to use Spanish territory to deploy its own military bases there. In 1982, six and a half years after Franco's death, Spain was drawn into NATO. However, in the same year the Socialists came to power in that country as a result of elections. They opposed Spain's NATO membership and promised the electorate to hold a referendum on this issue. Finding themselves at the country's governing helm, the Socialists reversed their stand towards NATO and agreed to continued membership of that bloc on definite conditions. The United States was compelled to agree to Madrid's new stance realizing that in other case it would lose everything.

Many observers believe that the outcome of the voting in the referendum could prove to be truly catastrophic for the United States had not many voters feared to create serious difficulties for the Gonzalez government by casting their vote in favour of a total break away with NATO. In these circumstances, when pressure from the Atlanticists was intensifying day after day, striking is not that slightly more than a half of those who took part in the referendum supported the government's case but rather that 40 per cent of all those who came to the ballot boxes said "no to NATO".

COMMENTARY ON 'INTIMIDATED' SPANISH POPULACE

LD132336 Moscow Television Service in Russian 1800 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Report on Spain's NATO referendum by V. Gorkayev; from the "Vremya" newscast]

[Excerpt] Roughly 52 percent of the Spaniards who participated in the referendum voted "yes" and 40 percent "no" to Spain's membership in the North Atlantic alliance.

Does this mean that the efforts by the fighters to have their country leave NATO turned out to be in vain? Of course not. The struggle of Spaniards for peace, for disarmament, and for neutrality did not begin and will not end with the holding of a referendum. Of course it won't be easy just as the political struggle on the eve of the referendum was not easy. Suffice it to say that practically all the mass news media, and first and foremost television, were on the side of the pro-Atlantists in Spain. Politicians of all ranks persistently intimidated the population with economic political and other sanctions on the part of allies in the military bloc, in the event that Spain did leave NATO.

The streets, so to speak, were in the hands of those who supported the country leaving NATO. They held thousands of meetings, discussions, and demonstrations in which millions of Spaniards took part throughout the country. It is thanks to a significant extent to their very efforts that the government had to make Spain's membership in NATO conditional upon its non-participation in the military organization of the bloc, the reduction of the American military presence in the country and the non-deployment [nyerazmeshcheniye] of nuclear weapons on the territory of Spain. Without these promises the government would hardly have succeeded in winning the referendum.

DELEGATION MEETS PCP LEADER CUNHAL, OTHERS

LD131551 Moscow Domestic Service in Russian 0830 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] The Soviet delegation representing our country at President Mario Soares' inauguration ceremony has had meetings and conversations with Portuguese leaders. Our correspondent Viktor Anikin reports from Lisbon.

During the meetings there have been conversations on a wide range of bilateral topics between the Soviet Union and Portugal. A central position has been taken by the problem of strengthening universal peace. In this connection, the Soviet delegation brought to the attention of the Portuguese leadership the decision adopted by the 27th CPSU Congress on the consistent course of the Soviet state toward expanding relations of friendship and cooperation with all countries of the world.

The Soviet delegation acquainted the Protuguese side with the new peace initiatives pronounced from the rostrum of the 27th CPSU Congress on the consistent course of the Soviet state toward expanding relations of friendship and cooperation with all countries of the world. The Soviet delegation also acquainted the Portuguese side with the new peace initiatives pronounced at the congress. Its attention was drawn once again to the 15 January statement by Comrade Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, in which it is proposed to implement a program of nuclear disarmament in stages in the world toward the year 2000.

The Soviet delegation met Alvaro Cunhal in Lisbon. Cunhal is the general secretary of the Portuguese Communist Party [PCP] and was congratulated on the Portuguese Communists on the recent 65th anniversary of the foundation of their heroic party. Alvaro Cunhal noted the historic significance of the 27th CPSU Congress in Moscow, in the work of which he took part. Comrade Cunhal told members of the Soviet delegation about the political situation in Portugal and about the struggle of Portuguese Communists for consolidation of the democratic forces in the country in the face of increased action by reactionary forces. During the conversation, a mutual desire to strengthen the ties of friendship and fraternity between the Communist Parties of the two countries and to expand mutual understanding and cooperation between the Soviet and Portuguese peoples was expressed.

INVESTIGATION OF KOHL 'PERJURY' NOTED

[Text] Bonn March 13 TASS -- By TASS correspondent Sergey Sosnovskiy: It has been officially announced here that Bonn's procuratorate today started an inquiry into actions by West German Chancellor Helmut Kohl who is suspected of giving false testimony. The alleged perjury happened at a session of the commission investigating the scandalous affair involving the illegal financing of major bourgeois parties and bribing of their leaders with money from slush funds of private monopolies.

Two investigations on identical charges are currently under way, both related to the present head of the Bonn government. Earlier, an inquiry was launched by the procuratorate in Koblenz. Lawyer Otto Schili, a prominent figure in the Greens Party, filed both the suits.

According to political observers, the investigation involving the names of a head of government is an unprecedented event in West German history.

Earlier, Otto Lambsdorff, minister of economics; and Rainer Barzel, Bundestag chairman; had to resign from their posts following the exposure of their complicity in the scandalous "flick affair."

As reported in the press, the investigation against Kohl caused confusion within Bonn's ruling elite which fears that this might have a negative effect on the results of the Bundestag elections slated for next year.

GOVERNMENTS IGNORE POPULAR OPINION ON MISSILES

LD122129 Moscow Domestic Service in Russian 1600 GMT 12 Mar 86

[Aleksandr Zhelkver commentary]

[Text] The trial on the action of the Netherlands defenders of peace against the government which has agreed to the deployment of U.S. nuclear missiles has begun in The Hague. Here is a comment by our political observer Aleksandr Zholkver who is at the microphone.

The trial in the Netherlands capital is notable in many respects. First and foremost, it clearly refutes the assertion that the antimissile movement has decreased and the West Europeans are almost welcoming the deployment of U.S. Pershing and cruise missiles in their countries. The judicial action against the Netherlands Government was signed by about 20,000 people, and the total number of signatures against the existence of U.S. nuclear missiles in the country is 4 million. That number is equivalent to the majority of adults in the country's population. The situation is similar in othbr Western European countries.

In the FRG, the leadership of the Social Democratic Party has called for taking an active part in the spring peace marches which will proceed under the motto: Pershings out. In Britain, there is no end to protest demonstrations at the U.S. military bases where cruise missiles are deployed. Many Western European observers stress that the new rise in the antiwar movement is connected with the fact that a realistic prospect for ridding the European continent of the explosives has appeared (?for people).

Such a prospect was opened by Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev's statement of 15 January which was again confirmed at the 27th CPSU Congress.

As is well known, concrete proposals for both the elimination of U.S. and Soviet medium-range missiles in the European zone and other aspects of security in Europe including a reduction of conventional armaments and measures to strengthen mutual trust and control have been set forth there. At present, eminent political figures in Western Europe, the West German Social Democrats again as well as the British Labour Party and Liberals are calling upon their governments not to miss this indeed historic chance to support and respond to the Soviet initiatives with their own proposals and at least not to object to arms reduction, as they at present do in London and Bonn, where reservations of all kinds against disarmament are set forth. At the same time, the attachment of these countries to the U.S. "starwars" plans is being strengthened.

As far as the Soviet Union is concerned, the Political Report of the Central Committee to the congress stressed that it is the European aspect that the CPSU considers to be fundamental in its international activity. Our country is for Europe advancing toward a more settled stage of detente, toward the creation of reliable security.

ANC'S NZO COMMENTS ON SOVIET CONGRESS, POLICIES

MB110940 Moscow in Zulu to Southern Africa 1800 GMT 10 Mar 86

[Text] On 6 March, the 27th CPSU Congress ended in Moscow. Our reporter has requested ANC Secretary General Alfred Nzo, who was also a member of the ANC's delegation to the 27th CPSU Congress, to make a few comments concerning Soviet domestic and foreign policies.

[Begin Nzo recording in English fading into Zulu translation] The outstanding feature of this congress was the way in which the CPSU delegates discussed matters, without fear or reserve. Valid criticisms were made and errors clearly pointed out. This was possible because of the personal dedication and trustworthiness of the delegates in the campaign to bolster the CPSU programs aimed at resolving various Soviet problems and improving the welfare of the Soviet people and the world's peace-loving peoples. This means a lot in terms of the CPSU's domestic policy. It means that in future the USSR will attain accelerated economic development. The congress approved a bulk of revised CPSU guidelines and principles meant to improve Soviet standards of living and also to foster rapid economic development. Such developments will strengthen the hand of the USSR in its self-imposed task of spearheading the campaign for international peace and security worldwide.

We who are engaged in a liberation struggle were inspired anew when the CPSU reaffirmed its willingness and determination to support all liberation movements fighting reactionary and oppressive imperialism and also to bolster the economic development of newly liberated countries that are now threatened by capitalist machinations aimed at domination, such as Angola, which is in a hot war against U.S.-sponsored UNITA dissidents directed by Jonas Savimbi, and Nicaragua in Latin America, which is also fighting U.S.-sponsored anti-Sandinist elements, the contras. While the 27th CPSU Congress discussed international relations, peace, and security, Reagan's White House administration was busy urging the U.S. Congress to approve more funds to assist the contras. Such provocative measures are opposed to the CPSU's foreign policy.

The Soviet people at the 27th CPSU Congress once again rededicated themselves to the relentless pursuit of freedom and peace worldwide. On hearing this Soviet declaration, our people in South Africa will be inspired anew to carry on with the difficult struggle, which seeks to eradicate apartheid completely in our country. GHANAIAN ENVOY'S MESSAGE ON INDEPENDENCE DAY

[Message from John Kofi Tettegah, Ghanaian ambassador to the USSR, on Ghana's Independence Day; Tettegah in English with superimposed Russian translation; from the "Vremya" newscast -- recorded]

[Text] Friends and comrades! Let me begin first by conveying warm fraternal greetings from the government and the people of the Republic of Ghana to the friendly government of the Soviet Union.

Ghana's attainment of its independence 29 years ago marked a turning-point in the liberation of black Africa. From the first days of independence, Ghana has in every way supported African peoples fighting for independence, human dignity, and their recognition on the international arena. The first president of Ghana, Kwame Nkrumah -- whose memory we cherish with respect and love -- used to say: Ghana's independence is meaningless if it is not connected with the full liberation of the whole African Continent. Today also the liberation of Africa remains a cornerstone of Ghana's foreign policy and thus it unreservedly supports the national liberation movements in the South Africa and Namibia.

Ghana is a comparatively young country, but over the past years it has gone through a number of complex political, economic, and social movements. The deepening economic crisis has evoked feelings of a lack of prospects and has put a brake on the activity of the population. This has led to its declining and refusing to fulfill its public duty. The struggle against the intrigues of international imperialism and internal sabotage has been led by the provisional National Defence Council. It has undertaken steps to stabilize the internal situation, to eliminate the economic decline, to reestablish the infrastructure, and to create conditions for fruitful work and a growth in labor productivity. At present we have revived the people's confidence in their strengths and convinced them that we can achieve much, and realize our hopes for the future. We know that we live in an interconnected world, and the achievement of universal peace is an essential prerequisite for our development. This is why we welcome the Soviet Union's efforts aimed at creating a new economic order that would help to eliminate the differences between the have and have-not countries.

Ghana fully supports the Soviet Government's proposals for a total elimination of nuclear weapons throughout the world by the beginning of the next century. The people of Ghana are deeply grateful to the Soviet Union for the material and technical help it has given. Ghana and the Soviet Union have common positions on a whole series of issues: For example, on the right of the working people to participate in government. Such a unity of views and coincidence of opinions on many international issues create strong bonds of bilateral friendship and cooperation. The anniversary of the Ghanaian independence coincides with the completion of the historic 27th CPSU Congress. The government and people of Ghana wish the Soviet people great successes, and I am convinced that the congress decisions will allow the Soviet Union and the whole world to enter a new era of peace and prosperity. Thank you for your attention.

USSR REQUESTS COSTA RICA TO EXTRADITE NAZI

PM140943 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 14 Mar 86 First Edition p 4

[Text] A note of the Foreign Ministry of the USSR has been handed over to the Costa Rican Embassy in Moscow.

The note says: The USSR Foreign Ministry pays its respects to the Costa Rican Embassy in Moscow and has the honor to state the following:

"Soviet investigating authorities have carried out an investigation in the case of Koziy Bogdan Ivanovich, born in 1923, responsible for having committed Nazi crimes during World War II.

The investigation has uncovered that Koziy, born in the Pukasivtsiy village of the Galich district of the Ivan-Franko region, a citizen of the USSR, now living in the Republic of Costa Rica, served as a policeman in the Lisetsk Regional Police between 1942-1944 on the territory of the Ivan-Franko region. This region was temporary occupied by the Hitlerites and engaged in active punitive activities against civilians. He personally tortured and killed innocent people, including women and children. In 1944, when fascist troops were retreating, Koziy escaped the Hitlerites to Western Europe to avoid punishment for the grave crimes he had committed. He then settled in the United States. In 1985 he was discovered in Costa Rica. The Soviet public rightfully express indignation at the fact that the criminal goes unpunished and demands that he be tried.

In this connection, the Soviet side would like to draw the attention of the Costa Rican Government to the relevant international law provisions under which Nazi war criminals are to be extradited to the countries where their crimes were to be tried and punished.

The Soviet side expects that the Costa Rican Government will adopt measures to hand Koziy over to the Soviet authorities so that proceedings can be taken against him in the place where he committed highly serious crimes against mankind. The ministry takes this opportunity once again to assure the embassy of its high respect."

COLOMBIA'S OCAMPO ON 'ERRONEOUS' U.S. CONTRA POLICY

LD131841 Moscow TASS in English 1114 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] Bogota March 13 TASS -- Colombia views as erroneous the U.S. stand on providing aid to the Nicaraguan "contras", since it is at variance with Latin American efforts to settle the crisis in Central America by political means, Ramirez Ocampo, foreign minister of Colombia, said in an interview with the newspaper EL ESPECTADOR.

Colombia considers that extending aid to counter-revolutionaries is a violation of international legal norms and blocs efforts to bring peace to Central America, he said.

Non-interference in the internal affairs of other countries, renunciation of armed aggression, the quest and solution of disputable issues by peaceful means have always been the pivot of the Colombian foreign policy, the foreign minister said. The same principles were confirmed at the latest session of the Organisation of American States last December.

MOSCOW PLAN REPORT DELIVERED BY SAYKIN

WA211111 Moscow MOSKOVSKAYA PRAVDA in Russian 26 Jan 86 p 3

["Draft of the Basic Guidelines for the Economic and Social Development of the USSR for 1986-1990 and the Period Through the Year 2000; Report by V.T. Saykin, chairman of the Executive Committee of Mossovet"]

[Text] The 26th city party conference is being conducted, the speaker remarked, during an exceptionally important period in the development of Soviet society. The course that was decisively taken by the party, the course aimed at the acceleration of our country's social and economic development and at the complete improvement of socialist society, opens up new horizons for Soviet citizens. That course is encountering universal approval and finding the complete and unqualified support of the workers of Moscow.

Among the three very important theoretical and political pre-congress documents, which are imbued with the concept of acceleration, a special place is occupied by the draft of the Basic Guidelines for the Economic and Social Development of the USSR for 1986-1990 and the Period Through the Year 2000.

In conformity with the decisions of the October 1985 plenum of the CPSU Central Committee, the speaker went on to say, the Moscow City party organization has carried out a great deal of work to explain, propagandize, and discuss the Draft Basic Guidelines. The study of this important document has been organized in all forms of political and economic training. The Draft Basic Guidelines were broadly discussed at almost 50,000 meetings of labor collectives, and at educational institutions and social organizations. A total of more than 4.2 million persons took part in the discussion. The workers of Moscow made more than 12,500 recommendations. The people of Moscow unanimously expressed their warm approval of that pre-congress document, the party's domestic and foreign policy, and the course aimed at the acceleration of social and economic development in our country, and once again demonstrated their close consolidation around the Leninist party.

At the same time, as was emphasized in the report by the party's city committee, in the course of discussion of the pre-congress documents, including the Draft Basic Guidelines, the Executive Committee of Mossovet and the rayon soviets, and their administrations and managements received numerous letters containing justified critical comments and recommendations aimed at improving the quality of work in all spheres of urban management.

The people of Moscow are persistently demanding the elimination of shortcomings in the organization of construction, the improvement of construction quality of apartment buildings and projects intended for social and cultural purposes, the improvement of capital repair, the introduction of proper order in the operation and maintenance of the housing fund and in the improvement of the adjacent territories, and provision for the prompt and efficient cleaning of streets and sidewalks.

Many inhabitants of the city are directing attention to the need for further improvement in the procedure for accounting for and distributing housing space.

Sharp criticism has been leveled at the managers of a number of transportation enterprises for their inability to guarantee dependable schedules for passenger transport, particularly in highly populated areas. Numerous substantiated complaints about the poor quality of the services provided, and the insufficient variety of commodities, especially during the morning and evening hours, have been expressed about the workers in the trade system and public nutrition.

A large number of complaints are still being received concerning questions of the organization of medical services for the public, including the maintenance of therapeutic institutions, the care of patients, and the quality of the food.

The Executive Committee of the Moscow City soviet the rayon party committees, and the executive committees of the rayon soviets consider it their direct duty to introduce order for each of the incoming remarks and recommendations, and they will take all steps to assure the most rapid elimination of the shortcomings in the work of the administrations, departments, and managements that are linked with the providing of services to the public.

During the years of the 11th 5-Year Plan, in industry, construction, and other branches of the city's economy, certain positive results were achieved. At the same time, in the development both of individual branches and of the city's economy as a whole during the years of the past 5-year plan a large number of unresolved problems and difficulties accumulated. This was mentioned in detail by Boris Nikolayevich Yeltsin in the report of the CPSU MGK [Moscow City Committee], in which he profoundly analyzed the state of affairs and the reasons for existing shortcomings.

For purposes of eliminating them and achieving qualitatively new goals in the development of the capital's economy, the city organizations, with the participation of the ministries and departments, and the enterprises and organizations of all branches of the national economy, under the guidance of the Moscow City party committee, prepared the Draft Basic Guidelines for the Economic and Social Development of Moscow for 1986-1990 and for the Period Through the Year 2000. A decisive factor in increasing the effectiveness of social production and its intensification is the attainment of high rates of introduction of the achievements of scientific-technical progress. For these purposes it is necessary to develop and to implement consistently a Moscow City territorial program for the intensification of the economy.

Major changes must be achieved in absolutely all branches of Moscow's national economy.

It is necessary first of all to carry out the fundamental re-equipping of industry to provide enterprises with highly productive technology, in order to guarantee the proper increase in the return on assets and labor productivity. The increase in the quality of construction and the reduction in the periods of time necessary to carry it out will be promoted by the further improvement of the planning and administration of construction production. Transport must undergo substantial modernization. It will be necessary to introduce on a broader scale new types of rolling stock that provide for a considerable reduction in the noise level, the air-pollution level, and the consumption of fuel and energy. For purposes of providing convenient communication between the new housing areas and the center of town, further development of the subway system and the accelerated construction of a trolleybus and streetcar lines are planned. By the year 2000 the volume of nonstop hauls through the central part of the city will be reduced by 60 percent.

The further resolution of the housing problem will require considerable effort. For those purposes, in addition to state capital investments for housing construction, the funds provided by ministries, departments, and the public itself will be involved on a broad scale.

The draft version of the plan for the comprehensive economic and social development of Moscow in 1986-1990, which has been developed under the guidance of the CPSU MGK, is subordinate to the resolution of the tasks posed by the party.

After approval, this plan will become the law for the city's entire life. Organization of its fulfillment by every branch, enterprise, and organization, as well as by the highly productive, intensive labor performed by every Muscovite will be of primary importance. And here, in the carrying out of that principle and that task, an important role must be played by the City Planning Commission along with the party and Soviet agencies. First of all it is necessary to increase the authority of Gosplan as a major territorial planning agency, to intensify organizational spirit and increase responsibility in its work, and to make it truly a coordinating and monitoring agency in questions of the comprehensive and harmonious development of Moscow, so that it will occupy its worthy place in the system of the republic's and the country's planning agencies, so that its authority at USSR Gosplan will be truly solid, and so that all the most important questions of the development of the city's national economy will be considered at USSR Gosplan with its direct participation.

When the draft of the plan for the 12th 5-Year Plan was being developed, careful consideration was taken of the results of the past 5-year period, and measures were stipulated to eliminate the lags that had occurred.

In conformity with the party's principles and decisions of the Bureau of the CPSU MGK, it is planned to devote the first-priority attention in the 12th 5-Year Plan to increasing the volume of industrial production. The growth rate for volumes of production is being doubled, with the entire increase being achieved by means of an increase in labor productivity, with a simultaneous reduction in the number of workers. The plan is aimed at providing outstripping rates for the development of those branches that determine scientific-technical progress. Important results must be achieved by the carrying out of large-scale measures to modernize and technically re-equip existing enterprises in Moscow industry. The volume of capital investments for these purposes will increase by a factor of 1.3 over the past 5-year plan.

It is planned to channel considerable funds into the construction, remodeling, and technical re-equipping of enterprises in Group B. The volume of production of commodities intended for cultural, everyday, and household use will surpass the 1985 level by almost 30 percent.

As was noted in the report of the CPSU MGK, the quality of output is becoming the object of special concern.

A major contribution to the acceleration of development of our country's entire national-economic complex and to raising the technical level of production in the capital must be made during the 12th 5-Year Plan by the scientific-research collectives. The program for cooperation between the Moscow scientific and production organizations stipulates the carrying out of work to develop 24 comprehensive target programs and problem-oriented research projects in the basic directions of scientific-technical progress.

Capital construction is taking on primary importance. As stipulated in the Basic Guidelines, construction workers are faced with the basic task of guaranteeing the creation and accelerated renovation of fixed assets intended for the development of social production and the resolution of social tasks, as well as the increase in effectiveness of construction production.

In conformity with the requirements of the CPSU MGK, Mosgorplan (Comrade Stepanov) must achieve a substantial increase in the effectiveness of capital investments, must concentrate them at projects to be activated in the next reporting period, and must achieve a considerable reduction in the number of projects being newly begun.

It should be noted that shortcomings and omissions in planning, and the lack of coordnation in the activity of Gorplan, GlavAPU, and GlavUKS, which frequently work in a disassociated manner, are in and of themselves a serious hindrance to improving capital construction. First of all, no provision is made for the prompt elaboration of 5-year plans for the placement of construction, which is the basis of the entire operation of the construction conveyor belt. Those plans contain an insufficient amount of work or evaluation of the reality of the engineering assimilation of the territories that are being planned for development, and little is done to coordinate the capabilities of the construction organizations and the enterprises in the construction industry. As a result, numerous changes are made in the approved plans, and the system of biennial continuous planning remains, to a large degree, unimplemented, and, in essence, formal. All this disorganizes construction production.

The Executive Committee of Mossovet, the rayon party committees, and the managers of the main administrations mentioned must bring about a fundamental change in the state of affairs.

Within the shortest periods of time, the speaker went on to say, it is necessary to carry out effective measures for the further improvement of the administration of capital construction, as well as the industrialization of construction production.

The use of the planned large volumes of capital investments for the implementation of the social and economic policy in the 12th 5-Year Plan will require a sharp increase in the capacity of the contract organizations of the Moscow Executive Committee, as well as the more active participation of the construction-and-installation organizations of the ministries and departments, and of all the enterprises situated on the territory of the city of Moscow, in the construction of projects intended for social, cultural, everyday, and other purposes.

Characterizing the broad group of tasks linked with improving the life of Muscovites and with the resolution of other social questions, it is necessary first of all to mention housing and cultural-and-everyday construction, to which the party and the Moscow City committee of the CPSU, as was emphasized in the report, are attaching first-priority importance.

In the course of resolving them, Glavmosstroy (Comrade Volkov), GlavUKS (Comrade Voronenko), GlavAPU (Comrade Makarevich), Gosarkhstroykontrol (Comrade Verushkin), the party's rayon committees, and the executive committees of the soviets must devote special attention not only to the prompt fulfillment of the plans that have been set down, but also to the quality of the projects being handed over. The acceptance of buildings and other projects for social, cultural, and everyday purposes will now be carried out in strict conformity with the established procedure.

In the 12th 5-Year Plan it is planned to fulfill operations involving the capital repair of housing with a total area of almost 26 million square meters and to improve their amenities, with the expenditure for this purpose being R1.61 billion, or 12.7 percent more than in the 11th 5-Year Plan. Glavmoszhilupravleniye (Comrade Poryvay), Glavmosremont (Comrade Bogomolov), and the executive committees of the rayon soviets must make economical use of those tremendous amounts of state funds. It is time to become completely aware that operations that have been poorly carried out are money thrown to the wind.

The capital's transport and communication will receive new development. The total volume of shipments during the years of the 5-year plan will increase by 11 percent. During the years of the 5-year plan, Glavmosavtotrans (Comrade Vasilyev) must guarantee the further centralization of the transportation processes, the development of container and packet shipments, the specialization of the motor truck pool, and the maximum introduction of diesel and compressed-gas vehicles.

It will be necessary for Glavmostorgtrans (Comrade Shipilov) to do a serious amount of work, since the transportation problem in the city continues to be one of the most critical, and one that the party's city committee and the Executive Committee of Mossovet has repeatedly brought to the attention of the main administration. The inhabitants of many rayons are not yet being provided with sufficient means of ground transportation.

The acuity of the transportation problem in many rayons can be relieved by the planned construction of new lines in the Moscow subway. During the 5-year plan, R840 million of capital investment will be channeled into this construction. A total of 34.6 km of new underground subway lines will be activated, including construction of the Timiryazev radial line, and the extension of the Kaluga-Riga line (from Belyayevo station to Teplyy Stan and Yasenev), the Kirov-Frunze line (to Podbelskogo, and the Fili line (to Krylatskoye).

Construction of a number of new post offices and activation of 23 automatic-telephone exchange buildings are planned.

In conformity with the Energy Program, steps will be carried out during the forthcoming 5-year period to achieve the further development of and increase the reliability of, the heat and energy supply system for the city of Moscow.

Large projects will have to be carried out in the water-supply and sewage management, including the completion of the construction of the Novo-Zapadnaya water-main station, the construction of the Rzhevsk hydraulic center on the Volga, the completion of all operations in the Vazuzskaya Hydraulic System, and the execution of operations to increase the capacity of the Rublevskaya water-main station, etc.

Questions of the development of trade and public nutrition require considerable attention. By constructing stores, primarily in rayons where there has been massive housing construction, the lag in providing the public in new rayons with that type of services will be eliminated. There will be a considerable increase in the network of public-nutrition enterprises during the 5-year plan.

The Main Administration of Trade (Comrade Zavyalov) and the Main Administration of Public Nutrition (Comrade Rodichev), as well as the party's rayon committees and the rayon executive committees, must concentrate the maximum amount of attention on the part of the enterprises toward improving the organization of their work.

In conformity with decisions of the bureau of CPSU MGK, one of the most important tasks confronting the food industry and trade is the considerable increase in the volumes of production and delivery of foodstuffs to the trade network in packaged form and its delivery in containers.

Major tasks will have to be resolved by the workers in the personal-services sphere. The volume of sale of personal services to the Moscow public in 1990, as compared with 1985, will be increased by 26 percent. In terms of a single resident, this will be more than R83, or R12 more than in 1985.

The Executive Committee of Mossovet is currently developing the "Zdorovye" [Health] comprehensive city program for 1986-1990. Similar programs must be created in the rayons and at all enterprises and organizations, with a consideration of the specifics and peculiarities of individual branches.

A concrete embodiment of the preventive nature of the "Zdorovye" Program is the provision of dispensary treatment to the public. In the 12th 5-Year Plan it will be necessary to carry out the gradual changeover to the complete annual dispensary treatment of the Muscovites. The sports committee and the executive committees of the rayon soviets will have to improve the organization of physical-culture and sports work at people's places of residence, labor activity, and training.

As was emphasized in the report by Boris Nikolayevich Yeltsin, in the 12th 5-Year Plan it will be necessary to resolve a large series of tasks that are linked with the reform of the general-educational and vocational school system and with the construction of children's preschool institutions.

In the 12th 5-Year Plan it is planned to build eight movie theaters (basically in the rayons where there has been widescale housing construction), and to begin the modeling of the circus on Tsvetnoy Bulvar, the building that houses the Musical Theater imeni Stanislavskiy and Nemirovich-Danchenko, and a number of others. In the rayons of widescale housing construction, it is planned to build 10 music schools for children. At the same time, a vitally important task of the executive committees of the city soviet, the rayon soviets, the Main Administration of Culture (Comrade Shadrin), and the party's rayon committees is the better use of the existing cultural-educational institutions, irrespective of the department to which they belong.

In 1986-1990 it is planned to begin the work of remodeling the Central Museum of V.I. Lenin and the Central Exhibition Room in Manezh. In 1989 it is planned to complete on Poklonnaya Gora the building of the monument to the victory of the Soviet nation in the Great Patriotic War of 1941-1945.

In the 12th 5-Year Plan the problem of labor resources in the city will become acute. As a result, for the 12th 5-Year Plan, a reduction in the number of persons working in industry, construction-planning and exploratory-planning organizations, in science, and in scientific services is planned. An increase in the number of workers and employees is planned basically in the branches that provide services to the population of the city, in education and public health, trade and public nutrition, and other branches. Therefore, the chief task in our practical work in the area of labor resources must be the freeing of manpower and its redistribution.

As a result of the shortage of labor resources, an important national-economic task, as was mentioned in the report, is the removal from Moscow, in conformity with the General Plan, of enterprises and organizations whose further development in the city is economically undesirable. The executive committees of Mossovet and the rayon soviets and the party's rayon committees must take under their constant supervision the plans that have been set down in this area.

I must report to the conference delegates, the speaker said, that when developing the draft of the new 5-year plan, we did not succeed in resolving at USSR Gosplan a number of questions of vital importance to the city.

Individual questions require decisions by the USSR Government. The Executive Committee of Mossovet will make the appropriate recommendations concerning all these questions and hopes that they will find a positive resolution.

For the successful resolution of the assigned tasks in the 12th 5-Year Plan we must display more energy, organizational spirit, and discipline. These qualities must be developed in all links of administration of the complicated management in Moscow. It is inadmissible to have a situation where, in order to clarify the true state of affairs, it is necessary to travel to the outlying areas since the information that arrives is distorted. This sharply reduces the manager's time, the productivity of his work, and the rate of its results. This is a tremendous shortcoming in our work. This situation is intolerable, whether it be a large matter or a small one. We shall hold strictly accountable those who hinder our working correctly.

From the very first days of the new year, the speaker continued, the workers in the capital extended the active struggle for the fulfillment of the planning assignments and the socialist pledges for the first year of the 12th 5-Year Plan.

The attention of the party, Soviet, and trade-union agencies is concentrated on those sectors that determine the success of economic and social construction not only in 1986, but also in the scope of the entire 5-year plan, and that provide the opportunity to lay the necessary base for the implementation of the tasks set for the long-term period. The main thing now is to assure that, in conformity with the decisions of the April and October 1985 plenums of the CPSU Committee, a major turning point will be achieved in all spheres of economic activity.

The complexity and scope of the tasks confronting the city's national economy persistently require a considerable increase in the creative, organizing role of the soviets of people's deputies.

I would especially like to mention the rayon link. It must keep in its field of vision the key questions in the life of the rayons. The rayon soviets, under the guidance of the party's rayon committees, and in conformity with the existing powers granted to them, will have to work more persistently and purposefully in striving for the comprehensive economic and social development on the territory subordinate to them.

For these purposes, in the rayons, it will be necessary to complete the elaboration of the plans for comprehensive economic and social development of the rayons. It is important for these plans to stipulate the shared participation of the enterprises and organizations situated on the territory of the rayons in the development of the rayon management and the network of enterprises and organizations linked with the provision of services to the public and the labor collectives working here.

The most active participants in carrying out the set plans must be the soviet deputies, of whom there are more than 11,000.

In conclusion, the speaker said that the discussion of the Draft Basic Guidelines for the Economic and Social Development of the USSR at our conference completes the conduct of meetings on that question in the party organizations and workers' collectives in Moscow. There is no doubt that the 26th Conference of the Moscow City Organization of the CPSU, expressing the opinion of all the party members in the capital, will unanimously approve the Draft Basic Guidelines.

MASALIYEV CONCLUDING REMARKS AT KIRGHIZ CONGRESS

WA111131 Frunze SOVETSKAYA KIRGIZIYA in Russian 25 Jan 86 p 2

[Concluding remarks by A.M. Masaliyev, first secretary of the Kirghiz Communist Party Central Committee, at the 18th Kirghiz Communist Party Congress]

[Text] Comrade Delegates!

In our opinion, the discussion of the Kirghiz Communist Party Central Committee and Auditing Commission reports was candid, keen and without hollow logomachy. Shortcomings were discussed fearlessly and without respect of persons. Many of the speakers expressed profound gratitude to the CPSU Central Committee, which has helped us discover the first causes of the most serious shortcomings in work, particularly in personnel policy, and helped us improve the atmosphere in the republic party organization.

All working people of Kirgizstan perceive this paternal concern of the CPSU Central Committee not only as attention to but also high trust in one of its combat detachments.

Permit me on your behalf and on behalf of the republic's Communists to once again thank the Central Committee and Central Committee Politburo for the high-minded party criticism, counsel, and instructions for an improvement in the entire organizing and ideological-educational work and give the assurance that we will draw the strictest conclusions from this.

I would like to emphasize once again and with all seriousness that accomplishment of the crucial tasks confronting us in the 5-year period that has begun is inconceivable without a fundamental reorganization of the style and methods of work of all components of the party, Soviet, economic, and public organizations. There must be just one style -- Leninist -- which presupposes the high competence of the personnel, scrupulousness, exactingness, and responsibility for the entrusted assignment. The Central Committee will evaluate the personnel by these characteristics alone and by how the state plans for economic and social development are fulfilled primarily.

We can work in the new way, Comrade M.S. Gorbachev points out, only by relying on the lively creativity of the people and their wisdom, talent, and labor. Our task is to develop the initiative and energy of the working class, peasantry, and intelligentsia; ascertain the specific paths for a growth in production, an increase in the efficiency of the economy, and an improvement in all sectors of the national economy; and to worthily greet the 27th CPSU Congress.

This is what the congress delegates discussed, and we fully support their thoughts and aspirations.

Of the entire diversity of subjects broached in the speeches, I would like to highlight the question of strengthening order and discipline. The concept of discipline is broad and encompasses all aspects of life. Yet it is understood narrowly in some places. It is necessary for life to proceed smoothly for everyone -- from the ordinary workman through the leader of any level -- and for this it is necessary to dispense emphatically and rapidly with all that is failing to justify itself and impeding forward progress.

The CPSU Central Committee pointedly and exactingly poses questions concerning the acceleration of scientific-technical progress, increased production efficiency, the economical and rational use of material-technical resources, and fundamental improvement in product quality. Specific, painstaking daily work is required here. These questions will not be solved by appeals and deliberations alone. Everyone must become involved in them, starting with the Central Committee and its Bureau. Strict and specific demands will be made on scientists, ministers and leaders.

We need to intensify party leadership of the youth organizations, primarily the Komsomol. We need to strengthen the party nucleus in the Komsomol organizations and enhance their responsibility for all that has been entrusted to them by the party. The Komsomol is our dependable reserve, and constant attention must be paid to it. More specificity in work with fewer general speeches and appeals is required of the Komsomol itself and the Kirghiz Komsomol Central Committee.

The issue of issues is a serious improvement in the work with the personnel. We are only at the start of the path in tackling this big task. Much must be done to firmly ensure strict observance of Lenin's principles of the selection and assignment of executive personnel of all levels. There are no other criteria here, nor can there be. The new Central Committee must pursue this fundamental party line unswervingly. Distortions in this principal question must be precluded. The republic party organization possesses politically mature, experienced personnel, yet at the same time it is necessary to boldly rely on fresh forces from the ranks of specialists, women, and young people, correctly combining experience and youth. Whatever the position this official or the other occupies here, he must not be beyond the supervision of the party committees and primary party organizations. Such a conclusion ensues from the speeches of our congress delegates, which were imbued with the spirit of the decisions of the CPSU Central Committee April and October (1985) plenums and the party's precongress documents.

The practical proposals and high-minded observations expressed by the delegates afford an opportunity for declaring that this congress was able to evaluate scrupulously the unsound activity and outmoded style and methods of work of its Central Committee. The republic party organization can and must tackle most important questions on the development of the economy and culture considerably better. It is essential that the purposeful, frank discussion at the congress not remain just words and that its searching, party-minded spirit be embodied in practical action in order that the serious shortcomings in party leadership of the economy, in personnel and educational work and in the activity of the elective authorities -- from the Central Committee through the primary party organizations -- be removed as quickly as possible.

Everything that has been said pertaining to the Central Committee report will be attentively studied, analyzed, and taken into consideration in the practical work of the new Central Committee, its Bureau, Secretariat, and departments and all party, soviet, economic, and public organizations.

Permit me to express cordial gratitude to all the comrades for the valuable frank proposals and wishes.

PUGO CONCLUDING REMARKS AT LATVIAN CONGRESS

WA211500 Riga SOVETSKAYA LATVIYA in Russian 26 Jan 86 p 1

[Speech by Boris Karlovich Pugo, first secretary of the Latvian Communist Party Central Committee, at the closing session of the 24th Latvian Communist Party Congress]

[Text] Comrade Delegates!

The first plenum of the new Latvian Communist Party Central Committee, which elected its executive authorities, has just ended.

B.K. Pugo notified the delegates of the plenum's results.

He then continued: On behalf of the newly elected Latvian CP Central Committee and Auditing Commission, permit me to cordially congratulate you on the trust you have shown and to assure you that we will try to justify it.

You will obviously agree that we have reason to thank all the workers who catered for the congress and also the accredited representatives of the mass media for their conscientious attitude toward their assignments.

I wish to express on behalf of the congress gratitude to our public for the attention and support and for the letters and telegrams addressed to the congress.

Comrades, for 2 days we have extensively and discursively discussed the results of the past 5-year period; objectively and exactingly analyzed accumulated experience, bottlenecks, and unsolved problems; and outlined together ways and means of fulfilling the plans for the future. We have a better understanding of our omissions and shortcomings and unutilized potential and possibilities now and understand more clearly the tasks confronting us.

All these are difficult, very serious tasks -- but perfectly feasible ones -- and we must do everything necessary to ensure their fulfillment without any reservation whatever, fulfillment in all sectors of the economy and all fields of the social sphere and in each labor collective.

Realization of the adopted decisions and all the ideas and targets advanced in the documents of the impending 27th CPSU Congress is our most important task. We will only be in a position to tackle it in full, comrades, with your help, and only in conjunction with the activists; all party organizations and soviet, economic, trade union and Komsomol authorities and all labor collectives.

The scale and complexity of the tasks that have been set make it incumbent upon us to operate with double, triple the energy and deal more persistently and efficiently than ever with questions of an intensification of production, an acceleration of scientific-technical progress, an improvement in the quality of output, an intensification of the practice of economies and thrift, and an increase in organization and order.

For this we need new approaches to all aspects of party, soviet and economic work, mobilization of all organizational, economic and social factors, the creative initiative and assertiveness of each labor collective and each workman, and an emphatic strengthening of discipline. I would remind you that V.I. Lenin considered the discipline of the workman and the ability to ensure implementation of party policy under all conditions the highest indication of party-mindedness.

Time, comrades, does not wait. It dictates the need for a manifold increase in exactingness toward all Communists, whatever positions they occupy; a sharp increase in their personal responsibility for their assigned area of work; and an emphatic eradication of manifestations of formalism, verbiage, grandstanding, and an uncritical attitude.

I believe it may be said that an atmosphere has now been created in the republic that entirely precludes any fear of the expression of critical observations about higher executives and affords extensive scope for criticism and self-criticism, particularly criticism from below.

This is our fundamental line, and it is supported and will continue to be supported by the Central Committee and the party organizations locally. No criticism can be embarrassing if it is objective, honest in a party-minded manner, and aimed at improving matters.

The morning says what the day will be like, the people say. We view the morning of the new day inseparably connected with an acceleration of society's socioeconomic development calmly and confidently and with real optimism. We have the forces and possibilities for working in the new way, with the necessary acceleration, in all components of production and management.

There is no more important job today than strengthening the country's economic and defense might and preserving peace. The congress delegates, like all communists and working people of the republic and all Soviet people, unanimously approved the statement of M.S. Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, which expounded the large-scale peace initiative of the Communist Party and the Soviet state.

Our main contribution to the strengthening of peace and international security is labor and only labor. And let us, comrades, work really conscientiously and responsibly, with the greatest input and fully in accordance with the spirit of the times.

We will evaluate each step forward in any place of work within an enterprise framework and on city or rayon scale as an important political contribution to the country's general progress and realization of the program aims that will be discussed and adopted by the 27th CPSU Congress.

Comrades, our congress' work is over. Permit me to declare the 24th Latvian Communist Party Congress closed.

Further Report

WA211502 Riga SOVETSKAYA LATVIYA in Russian 26 Jan 86 p 4

[Speech by Boris Karlovich Pugo, first secretary of the Latvian Communist Party, at the closing session of the 24th Latvian Communist Party Congress]

The discussion of the Central Committee report is at an end. Twenty-four persons -- party officials, representatives of the trade unions and Komsomol, leading workers and kolkhoz members, business manager, scientists, figures of culture and servicemen -- took part in the debate.

I believe we have reason to say that the discussion was conducted in a businesslike manner, in a spirit of high exactingness, and from standpoints of stringency and self-criticism. It confirmed with new force that the Communists and all working people of the republic unanimously support the decisions of the CPSU Central Committee's April and October (1985) plenums and correctly understand the tasks put forward by the party for accelerating the country's scientific-technical progress and entire socioeconomic development. It is now a question of accomplishing them in full and in the best way. The Latvian Communist Party Central Committee must persistently direct the efforts of the gorkoms and raykoms, primary party organizations, and all the Communists toward this.

The course of discussion of the report also showed that the strategic directions of the CPSU Central Committee April and October plenums and the party's precongress documents are not yet being implemented everywhere here with due purposefulness. A change toward an intensification of production and an acceleration of scientific-technical progress is only being effected slowly. The main indicator of economic efficiency -- the labor productivity growth rate -- does not correspond to the demands of the day. Output quality remains a bottleneck in a number of sectors and at many enterprises. Plans are being fulfilled, as before, at a price of big outlays and production costs. We have not succeeded yet in ridding ourselves of violations of state, plan, technological and labor discipline.

All this is a direct consequence of the fact that appreciable shortcomings -- superficiality in leadership, pretentiousness, and formalism -- and a habit of the old have not yet been completely eradicated in the activity of the Central Committee and its machinery and the gorkoms and raykoms. And this, as the delegates rightly observed, is incompatible with the spirit of party work, which in its very essence should at the current, pivotal stage of our development be truly creative, practical and efficient. The time of outmoded plans is irretrievably gone, and the time of bold decisions, energetic action and achievements has arrived.

The party's program course toward the achievement of a new qualitative state of society precludes any complacency. This thought permeated the entire work of the first day of the congress, which is all the more valuable in the context of the accomplishment of the impending tasks. It is the duty of the party organizations, primary party organizations primarily, not only to maintain the creative mood, decisiveness, and accord with which the tasks we have been set were discussed here, but also to multiply them and embody them in actual deeds in all the labor collectives and at each place of work.

We all agree that successful accomplishment of the goals set forth in the decisions of the CPSU Central Committee April and October Plenums and the party's precongress documents demands an unserving upsurge of the leading and directing role of the primary party organizations; a comprehensive improvement of the style and methods of party, soviet, and economic leadership; a sharp increase in the responsibility of cadres of all levels; and the development of their initiative and enterprise and the inseparability of words and deeds.

The delegates' speeches were perfectly correct to emphasize the need to strengthen the psychological reorganization of the personnel, a need that has been discerned, and the need to intensify the struggle against lack of responsibility, sluggishness, working by spurts, glossing over shortcomings and embellishing reality, the struggle against drunkenness and alcoholism, and the struggle against unearned income and abuse of office. We are obliged to continue to enhance the role and significance of socialist competition and to channel the competitors' energy, ability and enthusiasm into a universal increase in production efficiency, an acceleration of scientific-technical progress, an intensification of the practice of economies and thrift, and an improvement in product and work quality.

Associating myself with the opinion of many of the speakers, I would like to emphasize once again that the problems of a fundamental improvement in quality must be tackled actively at all levels of party leadership of the economy and in each component of production and management. Generally, comrades, a fundamental rise in the quality of all work is our daily concern brooking no delay. High quality must be a rule of the life of each worker and kolkhoz member, each representative of the intelligentsia, and all labor collectives.

Mention must be made of one further fundamental point -- namely, that all the speakers unanimously supported the CPSU Central Committee directive that the human factor should be at the center of all party-political work. Only by stimulating it in every possible way will we be able to reach the necessary level of responsibility of each and everyone for the observance of state, nationwide interests and a truly proprietary attitude toward public property and for the eradication of departmental and local preference and all violations of party, state and labor discipline, public order, and the rules of socialist community living.

There is surely no need to return again to all the conclusions that have been heard today from the congress rostrum. All of them, like the proposals and observations that reached the Presidium in written form, will be attentively studied by the new Central Committee and adopted for realization in current work.

Permit me, comrades, to conclude with this since the nature and content of the speeches and the complete unanimity of the delegates do not require extensive closing remarks.

GROSSU CONCLUDING SPEECH AT MOLDAVIAN CONGRESS

WA211501 Kishinev SOVETSKAYA MOLDAVIYA in Russian 25 Jan 86 p 2

[Text] Dear Comrade Delegates!

Discussion of the Central Committee report to the 16th Moldavian Communist Party Congress is at an end. The comrades who spoke supplemented and specified it appreciably, critically analyzed the activity of the republic party organization and its elective bodies, and revealed new potential for dynamic progress along the path of an improvement in all aspects of our life. Many new ideas and useful proposals were advanced aimed at overcoming the shortcomings and ensuring a radical improvement in organizational and political work in the republic Communist Party. Additions to the Draft CPSU Program were submitted and individual provisions of the draft party rules with the proposed amendments were amplified and specified.

All the delegates' speeches were imbued with efforts to match their activity and the activity of the party, soviet, and economic authorities with the innovation and scale of the tasks ensuing from the party's strategic line aimed at accelerating the country's socioeconomic development. Such an approach determined both the thrust of the speeches and their tone. Their speeches testify best of all to the increased sense of responsibility of the party activists for realizing the party's aims and irreconcilability toward all that has had its day and is impeding reorganization.

The range of questions raised in the speeches was exceptionally broad and diverse. Great attention was paid to the progress in realizing the CPSU Central Committee decree on the Moldavian Communist Party Central Committee report, problems of the selection, assignment and training of personnel, and the blunders made here and also how the style of party leadership of economic building is being perfected and reorganized. It was rightly emphasized that the said CPSU Central Committee decree has as yet been far from completely fulfilled.

A significant place in the delegates' speeches was occupied by questions of ideological work. Adherence to the old, outdated forms and methods of performing it was criticized. Serious shortcomings in the work of the educational institutions, cultural establishments and the corresponding ministries and departments were revealed.

Many comrades drew the congress' attention in their speeches to the major shortcomings in the activity of a number of ministries and departments and in the work of industrial enterprises. They correctly raised the issue that there are oversights in planning and material-technical supply and that inadequate use is being made locally of the possibilities for acceleration of the intensification of production and an increase in product quality.

Important state issues were discussed on the congress rostrum, including development of the republic's agrarian-industrial complex. The speakers emphasized the need to afford the personnel large scope for economic initiative and to step up the demands thereon for the state of affairs in production. Agricultural pacesetters spoke of the potential for a rise in the productivity of the fields and livestock sections and of their readiness to do everything to obtain big harvests, milk yields, and livestock weight gains in the first year of the 5-year plan.

A number of delegates sharply criticized the work of the construction organizations. Attention was drawn to the fact that words are at odds with deeds especially often here, plans are not being fulfilled, and progressive forms of the organization and stimulation of labor are not being introduced quickly enough.

It was perfectly natural that the delegates were disturbed by questions of a social nature. The speakers sharply criticized the serious shortcomings in providing the population with consumer goods and housing, and in trade, consumer services, health care and so forth. It was rightly noted that the kolkhozes, sovkhozes and industrial enterprises should make better use of the available possibilities for an increase in the production of food and consumer goods -- and only those of high quality, moreover -- and for the construction of housing and socio-cultural facilities.

We hope that the executive personnel of the republic, cities, rayons, enterprises, and farms will draw the correct conclusions from the delegates' critical observations.

As far as the criticism heard from this rostrum of the Moldavian Communist Party Central Committee and its Bureau, Secretariat, and departments is concerned, it was correct. It is essential that the new Central Committee probe the essence thereof and organize its work so that realization of the observations expressed contributes to an improvement in the style and methods of the activity not only of the Central Committee and its machinery, but of all elements of the republic party organization.

Simultaneously, the Central Committee must study and make creative use of the proposals put forward by the congress delegates for a rise in the level of party leadership in all areas of the republic's life. These proposals must be perceived as specific instructions to it from the participants in the highest forum of the republic Communist Party.

Comrade Delegates!

A new stage of activity is beginning for the republic party organization. It must be geared primarily to political and organizational support for realization of the plans and quotas of the 12th 5-Year Plan. The results of the 5-year plan will largely depend on how it starts out. We have data today on the work done in 20 days of January. It must be said that we are starting slowly, while some labor collectives have begun the year altogether badly.

The Ministries of Construction, Construction Materials Industry and Local Industry, and certain others had volume of production and labor productivity indicators for January lower than for the final months of the quarter and thereby lowered the intensity of the struggle for greater intensification of production and its increased efficiency and for fulfillment of the annual plans.

A number of industrial enterprises, including the Kishinev Tractor Plant and Refrigerator Plant, the Tiraspol "Elektromash" Plant, the Bendery Silk Works, the Dubossary Machine Shop and others are operating with considerably lower production indicators than last year.

As is known, the livestock wintering is a serious test for the rural workers. As a whole, in January the republic is 10-13 percent ahead of the 1985 level, in terms of milk production and herd productivity. However, Dumbravenskiy and Grigoriopolskiy rayons have only repeated last year's achievements, while Rezinskiy Rayon has even allowed gross milk production to decline 4 percent. The average dairy milk yields were 1-2 kg less than for the republic on average in Chernenkovskiy, Teleneshtskiy, Ryshkanskiy and Dondyushanskiy rayons. Organizations of the republic Ministry of Trade, Moldavian Potrebsoyuz, Ministry of Consumer Services and Ministry of Motor Transport failed to keep pace with the progress chart per the work results of 20 days. January's plans are in danger of being frustrated here.

It is necessary to rectify this state of affairs immediately in all production bays, remove the shortcomings preventing an acceleration of the production development rate before the end of the month, and assume more rapidly the pace laid down by the economic and social development plan for 1986. As mentioned in the report, the party committees cannot release these questions from their supervision.

Ahead of us, comrades, lies a great deal of intensive work. It demands of the communists and all working people of the republic the full mobilization of forces, knowledge, and energy and a qualitatively new attitude in all areas and in all spheres of social activity. Fewer words, assurances, and promises, more actual work, practical results, responsibility and scrupulousness, and coordination in work -- such is the essence of the party demands on each of us. Guided by these demands and perfecting the work style, we must achieve and will achieve the large-scale tasks confronting the republic party organization in light of the historic decisions of the upcoming 27th CPSU Congress.

MAKHKAMOV CLOSING REMARKS AT TAJIK CONGRESS

[Speech by K.M. Makhkamov, first secretary of the Tajik Communist Party Central Committee; at the closing session of the 20th Tajik Communist Party Congress]

[Text] Comrade delegates! I should first report news which is pleasant for all of us. Summing up all-union socialist competition with regard to the results of work on fulfillment of socialist pledges in 1985 and the 11th 5-Year Plan quotas and for a fitting greeting of the 27th party congress, the CPSU Central Committee, USSR Council of Ministers, AUCCTU, and Komsomol Central Committee recognized as winners and awarded Challenge Red Banners to the Tajik SSR, Leninabad Oblast and the city of Dushanbe and also to 20 different enterprises, associations and sovkhozes.

Permit me to warmly and cordially congratulate all of you and, through you, all working people of the republic on this award and high evaluation of our modest contribution to the accomplishment of the tasks put forward by the party.

This award gratifies us and makes much incumbent upon all of us. It is, it may be said, a big advance payment, to which we must respond with shock, selfless labor.

Comrades! Discussion of the republic Communist Party Central Committee report is at an end. Thirty-six delegates took part in the debate. They represent the majority of city and rayon party organizations and all oblasts and also the party organizations of the major production collectives, ministries, departments, scientific establishments, creative unions, and public and other organizations.

The speeches of the congress delegates extensively reflected all the most important aspects of the republic's economic, social, and cultural life; raised numerous urgent problems; and proposed specific ways of solving them.

We received with great attention the cogent speeches of comrade delegates Khodzhiyev, Khalimov, Sycheva, Sultanov, Davlyatshoyeva, Shakirov, Gulova, Kalandarov, Lobov, commander of the Red Banner Central Asian Military District, and others.

The main thing contained in all the speeches was the sense of high responsibility of the party organizations and the Communists for an improvement in the republic's affairs, primarily its economy, the speediest commissioning of much unutilized potential, and the more energetic accomplishment of the tasks pertaining to an intensification of and further rise in the efficiency of social production.

Mention should be made with satisfaction of the increased level of criticism and self-criticism, the seriousness of the formulation of questions, and exactingness in the evaluation of what has been done. Expressing the will of their party organizations and the labor collectives, all the speakers spoke of the complete and unanimous approval of and ardent support for the domestic and foreign policy of the Communist Party and the Soviet state and decisions of the CPSU Central Committee April and October (1985) plenums and the course they formulated. The course is being pursued consistently toward an acceleration of the country's socioeconomic development and a readiness to apply all forces to make an impressive contribution by the republic to the accomplishment of state tasks.

The speeches fully approved the party's precongress documents.

We delegates must convey the practical experience, innovative mood, and fighting spirit of the congress to all party organizations and Communists and the broadest working people's masses. This should introduce new, fresh impetus and impart an even broader scale to and enhance the efficacy of nationwide socialist competition for a fitting greeting of our Communist Party's 27th Congress and the successful accomplishment of the crucial and increased tasks of the first year of the 12th 5-Year Plan.

Ensuring success here under present conditions means primarily activating our main, essentially inexhaustible, reserve -- the human factor -- which is contained in the creative initiative of the workers and in the universal establishment at all levels of high organization, discipline, and order.

It may be said with confidence that the wide-ranging exchange of opinions on the Central Committee and Auditing Commission report, practical advice, constructive proposals, and critical observations expressed here will help us formulate specific and comprehensively substantiated decisions embodying the spirit of the times and the party's current demands.

A great deal of complex work requiring boldness, energetic action, endurance, and the maximum exertion of efforts lies ahead. The republic's frontiers are determined in the socialist pledges, and it is our primary patriotic and international duty to honorably keep the word we have given the party and the people.

Permit me on behalf of the congress delegates and all Communists and working people of the republic to once again assure our party's Leninist Central Committee and the CPSU Central Committee Politburo that Tajikstan's workers will greet the upcoming 27th party congress with fitting labor gifts and will fulfill the plans and pledges of the current year and the new 5-year plan as a whole.

NAZARBAYEV ADDRESSES KAZAKH SSR CONGRESS

WA270920 Alma-Ata KAZAKHSTANSKAYA PRAVDA in Russian 9 Feb 86 pp 2-4

[Speech published under rubric, "16th Congress of the Communist Party of Kazakhstan": "The Draft Basic Guidelines for the Economic and Social Development of the USSR for 1986-1990 and the Period Through the Year 2000; Report by Chairman of the Kazakh SSR Council of Ministers N.A. Nazarbayev"]

[Text] Comrade delegates:

The 16th Congress of the Communist Party of Kazakhstan is being held in an atmosphere of high political and labor enthusiasm, which has been evoked by the nationwide socialist competition in honor of the forthcoming 27th CPSU Congress and by the discussion everywhere of the draft party program and the CPSU Statutes, with proposed amendments, as well as the Basic Guidelines for the Economic and Social Development of the USSR for 1986-1990 and the Period Through the Year 2000.

The realistic nature and the profound social optimism contained in those documents evoke in each of us the striving to work selflessly, in an initiatory manner, and with greater responsibility. The innovative statements and main directions in the activity of the CPSU and our society as a whole, which were developed in the pre-congress documents, have been perceived by the party and the Soviet nation as a program of combat actions.

The decisions of the April and October 1985 plenums of the CPSU Central Committee and the statements made by Comrade M.S. Gorbachev concerning the most important problems of the development of our society contribute to the confirmation, in the activity of the party committees and the Soviet and economic agencies, of a concrete, businesslike, and demanding approach to the examination and implementation both of the current tasks and the long-range ones.

The Leninist foreign-economic policy of the Communist Party and the Soviet state enjoy nationwide support. The statement by General Secretary of the CPSU Central Committee M.S. Gorbachev expresses the heartfelt yearnings of Soviet citizens, and of progressive mankind as a whole, to bridle the arms race and preserve the peace for the current and future generations. Unanimously approving the draft of the CPSU Central Committee entitled "Basic Guidelines for the Economic and Social Development of the USSR for 1986-1990 and the Period Through the Year 2000," the Communists and workers of Soviet Kazakhstan are firmly resolved to mobilize the entire potential, all resources and capabilities for the implementation of the party's plans to reinforce the economic and defensive might of our motherland and to raise the national standard of living.

Comrades, according to the tradition that has developed, on the days when the congress is at work, not only is there an assignment of the tasks for the future, but there is also an objective summing up of the results of what has been done and a determination of the reasons for any shortcomings or omissions that may have occurred.

In the report of the Central Committee, which revealed the multifaceted activity of the republic's party organization and all the labor collectives during the period between congresses, member of the Politburo of the CPSU Central Committee, First Secretary of the Kazakh Communist Party Central Committee Comrade D.A. Kunayev, remarked that the past five-year period became for Kazakhstan a new and major stage in the development of the economy, science, and culture. There was an increase in its contribution to the country's single national-economic complex.

During that period the volume of industrial production increased by 5 billion rubles, or 19.4 percent. Our enterprises assimilated the production of many articles that were new for our republic -- articles intended for production and technical purposes, and consumer goods. Output with a total value of almost 800 million rubles was produced in excess of the total annual plans.

Almost 50 billion rubles were invested in the development of the national economy, from all sources of financing. This amount is 15 percent more than during the previous five-year plan. Fixed assets valued at 47.2 billion rubles, or an increase by a factor of 1.2, were activated. Approximately 400 industrial enterprises and large-scale shops and production entities were activated.

In agriculture, as compared with the 10th 5-Year Plan, there was an increase in the production and purchases of rice, corn grown for grain, vegetables, potatoes, livestock and poultry, milk, eggs, and wool. There was an increase in the level of technical provision with transportation and communication, as well as an increase in the freight turnover and volume of passenger hauls and the total length of highways with solid surfaces.

Major measures were carried out in the area of social development. There was a noticeable increase in the average wages of the workers and employees, and the payment of the labor performed by kolkhoz members. The payments and benefits from social consumption funds per capita of population increased by 15 percent. There was an increase in the state aid to families with a large number of children and those poorly provided for, and to disabled persons and participants in the Great Patriotic War. Housing conditions were improved for more than 3 million residents of our republic. The increase in the volumes of retail commodity turnover came to 17.3 percent, and personal services for the public came to 38 percent.

All this was the result of the constant concern shown by the CPSU Central Committee and the Soviet Government for the complete development of our republic's national economy, and was the result of the strenuous labor performed by its working class, kolkhoz peasantry, and intellectual class.

When speaking about achievements, one cannot fail to mention the fact that a number of branches of industry failed to fulfill the assignments for the 5-year plan. The growth rates for volume of production and labor productivity as a whole proved to be, respectively, 3.6 and 4.6 points below the assignments. Every fourth enterprise failed to fulfill its contractual obligations with regard to shipments of output, and the return on assets fell 15 percent. According to the data provided by a study that was carried out, out of 334 projects turned over during the past nine years, almost half of them failed to reach the rated capacity. The rural laborers also continue to be largely in debt. During the 5-year plan, 18.5 million tons of grain were undershipped to the state, and the assignments for the basic types of animal-husbandry output were also unfulfilled. In construction, 2.7 billion rubles of capital investments were underused.

The lag that was allowed to occur was caused, to no small degree, by the fact that individual ministers and chairmen of committees and oblast executive committees were unable to reorganize their work in conformity with the principles enunciated by the April 1985 plenum of the CPSU Central Committee, and frequently expended their energy not for the reinforcement of state planning discipline, but in the search for various reasons and arguments for adjusting the plans. Lulling themselves with average-statistical prosperity and the victory reports sent in from their subordinates, they occupied a position of adapting themselves to the situation that had developed, instead of actively interfering and changing it for the better.

Something else that has been producing negative consequences is the work style that has developed in the outlying areas and that has not yet been overcome -- the style of crowing about individual successes, of praising the rayon and oblast leadership for nonexistent merits.

All this also became possible because the republic's management did not take prompt steps in a manner based on true party principles to discontinue such unsuitable work methods. In the final analysis there was a reduction in the effectiveness of the administration of the national economy. We see here the shortcomings not only of the Presidium of the Council of Ministers, but also my own, as Chairman of the Council of Ministers and member of the Bureau of the Central Committee.

The Kazakh SSR Council of Ministers, under the leadership of the Kazakh Communist Party Central Committee, will increase the demands it makes upon the managers at all levels of responsibility for their realistic contribution to the general task, the fulfillment of plans, and the increase in organizational spirit and order. The finish line of the 5-year plan showed that even a slight improvement in discipline provides its results: the increase in industrial output achieved last year was more than 1.5 times greater than the average annual increase in the first three years. Life confirms the correctness of V.I. Lenin's instruction to the effect that "the conditions for an economic upsurge are... an increase in the workers' discipline, the ability to work, the briskness and intensity of labor, and the better organization of labor."

The government, the ministries and departments, and the oblast executive committees, with a consideration of the tasks that the congress will define, will have to carry out steps to overcome the existing shortcomings and gaps in the work and to guarantee the dynamic growth of the national economy during the 12th 5-Year Plan and in the long-term period.

Comrades! When defining its long-term strategy, the party continues to advance as its chief task the guaranteeing in our country of a further rise in the standard of living for all segments and social groups in the population and profound changes in the sphere of people's working and everyday living conditions on the basis of the acceleration of scientific-technical progress and the complete intensification and increased effectiveness of production. The party's course, which is aimed at intensifying the social orientation of the economy's development, was concretely expressed in the fact that in the 12th 5-Year Plan, by means of the country's 19-22 percent increase in national income, it is planned for per-capita real income to increase 13-15 percent, and for the production of consumer goods to increase 22-25 percent, with an averall growth in industrial production of 21-24 percent. For the 5-year plan as a whole, a broad program of measures for improving all aspects of the life of Soviet citizens is planned.

Special attention is being devoted to implementation of the Food Program and to questions of building up the production of agricultural output and guaranteeing complete processing and that it is intact. The creation of Gosagroprom [State Agroindustry] will also contribute to the resolution of these tasks.

All the fraternal union republics are receiving further development. Their common efforts are reinforcing our country's economic might and resolving large social problems. This is yet another brilliant testimony to the triumph of the Leninist national policy of the CPSU.

Tasks on a broad scale must also be resolved by Soviet Kazakhstan.

It is planned that national income increase 18-20 percent, compared to the 7.2 percent achieved in the past 5-year plan. On the basis of the changeover to the intensive paths of development, it is planned that by the year 2000 the productivity of social labor increase by a factor of 1.6-1.8, including 19 percent in the 12th 5-Year Plan. Progressive structural shifts will be carried out in the economy, as well as measures to reduce its materials-intensity and to increase the yield on capital investments.

By means of the further buildup of the potential of the Pavlodar-Ekibastuz and other territorial-production complexes, the assimilation of new deposits of petroleum, gas, and polymetallic and iron ores, the construction of new enterprises, and the expansion of the existing ones, there will be an increase in the importance of the Kazakh SSR in our country's fuel-and-energy balance sheet and in the production of mineral fertilizers and ferrous and nonferrous metals.

Our republic will continue to be a major grain and animal-husbandry base for our country. It is planned to increase grain production in 1990 to 30-31 million tons, compared with an average 21.3 million tons per year in the past 5-year plan. The volumes of production of meat and milk will increase respectively 21-29 and 17-19 percent.

The nonproduction sphere will receive considerable development.

The Acceleration of Scientific-Technical Progress and the Development of Industry

Comrades, the main key to our rapid movement forward in the strategic areas of development of the economy, to the efficient transformation of productive forces, and to the technical re-equipping of production lies in the complete acceleration of scientific-technical progress. In our republic it is planned, by means of the components of that progress, to achieve half the total increase in national income.

At enterprises and construction sites it is planned to annually carry out approximately 20,000 measures involving the modernization of equipment, the improvement of technological schemes, and the mechanization and automation of production. It is planned that 10.8 billion rubles of capital investments will be channelled into remodeling and technical re-equipping. This is 76 percent more than in the past 5-year plan.

Application of the target-program method of planning is expanding. The basic assignments of 13 republic-level scientific-technical programs (out of 18) have been included in the draft versions of the plans for the 12th 5-Year Plan and in the composite "Intensifikatsiya-90" [Intensification-1990] program, which, together with the programs for the conservation of resources, labor, and energy, will make it possible to achieve a considerable saving of resources. The ministries and departments and Gosplan must make sure that their content finds material expression in the assignments of the annual plans.

It must be noted that the union between the scientists in our republic and our production managers does not always yield the necessary benefit. And yet this is one of the basic reserves for our acceleration. Many beneficial recommendations made by scientific organizations fail to find any practical application for years on end.

It is planned, on the whole -- for introducing into production the achievements of science and technology during the new 5-year plan -- that R1.4 billion rubles be expended, with an economic benefit of approximately R800 million rubles a year resulting from raising the technical level of production.

Questions of scientific-technical progress must be constantly in the center of attention of Gosplan, the ministries and departments, and the oblast executive committees.

A person who should give broader scope to that work is the first deputy chairman of the Council of Ministers, Comrade Grebenyuk, who is in charge of this sector in the republic's government. We have in mind, first of all, acceleration of the introduction into practice of completed scientific research and progressive technological schemes, and the carrying out of measures to create and produce the latest technology and other output that meet world standards.

A considerable role in the resolution of national-economic problems belongs to science, into the development of which, in addition to capital investments, it is planned that almost 500 million rubles be channeled.

A leading place here is assigned to Kazakh SSR Academy of Sciences, which unites in its ranks 134 academicians and corresponding members and hundreds of talented doctors and candidates of science, who are capable of coping with many complicated tasks. However, I must say that the academy leadership, headed by its president, A.M. Kunayev, is carrying out its job inertly, without the proper initiative. It has been incapable of itself raising our republic's scientific forces for the resolution of the fundamental problems of science or the national economy. Therefore it is not by accident that not a single institute in the academy has not become part of the international scientific-technical complexes that have been created in our country, or that, during the entire 5-year plan that has elapsed, not a single licensing agreement was concluded. One is also alarmed by the fact that last year the economic effectiveness of a single introduced development, compared to 1980, was reduced by almost one-half, and out of 76 recommendations submitted by the Academy of Sciences, because of the fact that they had been insufficiently worked out, only five were included in the current year's state plan, while only nine were included in the ministry and departmental plans.

At the congress today it must also be said that our republic's Academy of Sciences has proved to be an organization that is not to be criticized. The atmosphere that has been created there is one of servility and toadyism. Apparently for that reason the president of the Academy of Sciences not only fails to appear at sessions of the Council of Ministers, but also at the balance-sheet commissions. Thus, he simply dodges his duties.

Dimash Akhmedovich, we think that it is high time to call him to order.

The Presidium of the academy should take urgent steps to increase the role and authority of Kazakhstan's science, especially since, during the 12th 5-Year Plan, there will be a considerable reinforcement of the experimental base of a number of the academy's institutes and organizations.

The responsible tasks confronting our republic require, both on the part of the academy science and on the part of branch science, including its plant sector, greater purposefulness in striving for high national-economic results. We have the right to expect energetic actions also on the part of the scientists at institutions of higher learning, who constitute one-fourth of our republic's scientific potential, but who are not yet making their proper contribution to the resolution of its major scientific-technical problems.

One of the most important factors in the intensification of production is the intensification of economy measures. At the present time, the requirements have changed, and the approach to economy measures must be fundamentally different. As you know, in the 5-year plan that has begun, it is planned that 75-80 percent of the need for fuel and raw and other materials will be satisfied by means of economy measures involving them. Putting it another way, the feasibility of our plans depends upon the guaranteeing of the maximum conservation of materials and energy at every work station. It is important to be profoundly aware of all of this and to intensify the work of assuring economical procedures and thrift. Despite the new requirements, in a number of places one continues to observe flagrant mismanagement in the use of material resources. For example, in six trusts of the Kazakh Mintyazhstroy [Ministry of Heavy Construction] alone, last year the losses of rolled metal and construction glass came to 7-10 percent of the total consumption. And there are many such situations.

Comrades! The draft of the Basic Guidlines stipulates a 23-26 percent increase in Kazakhstan in the volume of industrial production in 1986-1990. The average annual rate of increase will grow from the 3.6 percent achieved in the 11th 5-Year Plan to 4.2-4.7 percent. Approximately 85 percent of the increase in output is supposed to be obtained at existing enterprises by means of the better use of the capacities and the increase in labor productivity.

There has been a noticeable increase in the rates of development of the branches in the fuel and energy complex. The extraction of coal in 1990 will increase basically by means of building that extraction in the Ekibastuz coal basin, as well as at the Subarkolskoye deposit. Operations will begin to assimilate the Maykubenskiy basin.

The Ekibastuzugol Association (Comrade Kurzhey) and the Karagandaugol Association (Comrade Drizhd) must improve the work of the operating mines and shafts, and must guarantee the prompt preparation of new working strata and the effective use of mechanized complexes and rotor excavators.

On the basis of intensive assimilation of the existing deposits on Mangyshlak, Buzachi Peninsula, and the Caspian Depression, as well as the beginning of exploitation of a new deposit in Guryev Oblast, there has been an increase in the extraction of petroleum. Extraction of gas and of gas condensate will also increase.

Mangyshlakneft Association (Comrade Dergachev), Embaneft Association (Comrade Sagingaliyev), Aktyubinskneft Association (Comrade Sviridov), Tengizneftegaz Association (Comrade Yasaveyev), and Kazakhgazprom Association (Comrade Novikov) must accelerate the assimilation of new, promising deposits in west Kazakhstan and must carry out steps to increase the effectiveness of the exploitation of oil and gas wells, to introduce progressive technological processes, and to reduce the losses of casing-head gas. The appropriate ministries and departments in the republic, party committees, and oblast executive committees must guarantee the unconditional fulfillment of all the tasks that have been defined by the decree of the CPSU Central Committee and the USSR Council of Ministers entitled "Measures to Create the Caspian Petroleum-Gas Complex."

The production of electric energy will reach 102.7 billion kWh, which is twice as much as in 1975. For this purpose, constructing and activating capacities at the Ekibastuz GRES-2, the South Kazakhstan GRES, and the Shulbinskaya GES is planned. The construction of Ekibastuz GRES-3 will also begin.

By the end of the 5-year plan we shall see completion of the process of connecting all sections and animal farms on sovkhozes and kolkhozes to the centralized electric-power supply system.

The steady work of the energy enterprises is of tremendous importance for the entire national economy. In the 11th 5-Year Plan, because of the emergency stoppings of the units, there was an underproduction of almost 13 billion kWh of electrical energy. Those outages led to sharp limitations for the customers and to a considerable underproduction of output, especially in the energy-intensive branches, and that, to no small degree, exerted an influence upon the final indicators of the 5-year plan. As a result of the complete collapse of the work and his inability to manage, it was necessary to part with Minister B.P. Ivanov.

Kazakh SSR Minenergo [Ministry of Power and Electrification] (Comrade Kazachkov) must guarantee more stable and more effective work from the energy equipment, must constantly supervise the rate of construction and activation of new capacities, and must strive to combine capital repair operations on the equipment with their modernization and the economical expenditure of fuel. A very important task for the republic is prompt carrying out of the processes planned for the 5-year period by the USSR Council of Ministers -- the technical re-equipping and remodeling of 22 electric-power stations, where 61 obsolete turbines are to be dismantled and replaced. This must be in the center of attention both of the republic agencies and the oblast ones.

The volume of primary refining of petroleum will be increased 38 percent. It is also proposed to increase considerably the depth of its refinement by means of the introduction of units for coking the crude oil at the Chimkent and Pavlodar refineries and catalytic cracking at the Chimkent refinery.

Approximately R5 billion of capital investments are being channeled into development of the branches in the fuel and energy complex. This amount is 1.8 times more than in the past 5-year plan.

In ferrous metallurgy, the increase in the volumes of production will be achieved basically by means of more intensive use of the potential that has already been created. In order to reinforce the branch's raw-material base, it is planned to introduce new capacities at the Lisakovsk, Sokolovsko-Sarbaysk, and Donskoy mining and concentration combines. There will be an increase in the receipt of ore from the very promising Kachar Combine. The extraction of manganese ore and the production of ferroalloys will increase. At the Karaganda Metallurgical Combine it will be necessary to complete construction of the sheet iron shop, which when started up will be the leading sheet iron producer in the country. However, in the past 5-year plan Kazakhstan Magnitka as a whole operated unsatisfactorily, underproducing more than one million tons of steel and almost 2.5 million tons of rolled ferrous metals, compared with its assignments. The full responsibility for this is borne by Comrades Akbiyev and Soskovets. At the present time, in the first years of the new 5-year plan, it is important to maintain the planned rhythm constantly. It is simply inadmissible for the leader in our republic's heavy industry to be among the laggards.

In nonferrous metallurgy in the past 5-year plan, the problem of its raw-materials base failed to find complete resolution. Of the funds allocated for those purposes, R250 million, or 10 percent, remain unused. The responsibility for that attitude toward the job at hand lies not only with Kazakh SSR Mintsvetmet [Ministry of Nonferrous Metallurgy], but also with Mintyazhstroy [Ministry of Heavy Construction], which instead of building up the volumes of operations for that branch, dropped them from 161 million rubles in 1981 to 147 million in 1985. And that was despite the fact that Mintsvetmet transferred more than R100 million of its capital investments for reinforcement of the base of its construction organizations. Comrade Makiyevskiy must be completely aware that this situation cannot be tolerated in the future.

Another factor that exerted an effect upon lowering the indicators in nonferrous metallurgy was the lag that had been allowed to occur in the stripmining and other preparatory operations, and the impoverishment of the ore being extracted. As compared with the assignments in the 5-year plan, there were considerable failures to produce the target volumes of the basic types of nonferrous metals. The leadership of the ministry (Comrade Takezhanov) has been slow to resolve the problems, which have become acute, has not been showing the proper persistence or demandingness toward the enterprise managers, and has been working in accordance with the old methods.

Inasmuch as our republic's nonferrous metallurgy is a branch of union specialization, it is important to organize the purposeful work of implementing everything that has been planned and of increasing the contribution made by Kazakhstan to our country's nonferrous-metals balance sheet.

The volume of production of chemical and petrochemical industry during the 5-year period will increase by a factor of 1.5 -- including mineral fertilizers, by a factor of 2.3. By 1990 there will be a considerable increase in the production of tires for agricultural machinery. The administrators in Chimkent Oblast and the Chimkentshina Association, together with the union ministry, must urgently resolve the entire series of questions as a result of which the association had been working at only 50 percent of capacity in the past.

The raw-materials base of phosphorus production is expanding as a result of the buildup of the capacities at the Karatau Association and the activation of the Chilisayskiy Phosphorite Mine.

In order to reinforce the mineral and raw-materials base of the national economy, the Kazakh SSR Ministry of Geology (Comrade Chakabayev) must use progressive methods to guarantee expansion of the scope of geological-prospecting operations, paying special attention to their intensification in areas of the republic's mining enterprises that are already operating. It is also necessary to raise the level of substantiation of the forecasts and the geological-economic evaluation of the deposits of minerals.

Comrades, the process that acts first of all as the basis for the technical re-equipping of the entire national economy is the accelerated production of new generations of machinery and equipment, increasing their reliability and other qualitative parameters to the level of the best worldwide models.

Considering this fact, in the 12th 5-Year Plan priority importance is being attached to the development of machine-building. The volume of its output is supposed to increase by no less than 40-45 percent.

Special attention will be devoted to increasing the output of the electrical-engineering and machine-tool-building industry, to instrument-building, and to machinery and equipment for vegetable and animal husbandry.

It must be emphasized that, despite the outstripping role of this branch during the past years, the share of machine-building proper in the structure of our republic's industry remains low, constituting only 11 percent. Therefore Gosplan and the local party and Soviet agencies must take a more attentive and self-interested attitude toward the recommendations made by the machine-building ministries with regard to the creation of their enterprises on the territory of Kazakhstan.

For our republic, as the largest mining region in the country, a factor of exceptional importance is the problem of complete use of the raw materials and the maximum involvement of secondary resources in production. Much is being done in this direction, but the scope of that work is not yet sufficient. Practically speaking, we have unlimited capabilities at our disposal here.

Our republic has only begun processing and using the waste products and tailings at the nonferrous and ferrous metallurgy enterprises, as well as using the slags resulting from blast-furnace and phosphorus production and thermal electric-power stations, or the inert materials formed during mining operations. The volumes of collection of many types of secondary raw materials have been miserly. That is why the assignments stipulated in the 5-year plan computations for increasing the completeness of the use of raw materials and the involvement of secondary resources in circulation should be viewed as the minimal ones. The organization responsible for this work is Kazakh SSR Gosplan, which must improve that work.

The ministries and departments and the collectives at the associations and enterprises must strive persistently to achieve the qualitative changes in making the effective use of all resources and production capacities, and must intensify responsibility for the final results of the labor and for fulfillment of the plans.

Development of the Agroindustrial Complex

Comrades, in our republic's agroindustrial complex, the basic task consists in reaching the goals set by the Food Program. That will make it possible to increase the gross production of agricultural output by a minimum of 13-15 percent.

In vegetable husbandry the grain harvests in 1990, as was already noted, will have to be increased to 30-31 million tons, or 9-10 million tons more than the average annual harvests in the past 5-year period. It is planned that a stable increase in the production of hard and strong varieties of wheat and of groats and cereal-legume crops, and that complete statisfaction of the public's needs for vegetables and potatoes be achieved. The capabilities for doing this exist. As early as the current year, grain crops will be grown by intensive technological methods on 5.5 million hectares. This is supposed to produce 3.3 million additional tons of grain. There will be an increase of almost 2.5 times in the shipments of herbicides to combat wild oats.

In the current 5-year period it will be necessary to put into cultivation 400,000 hectares of new irrigated land and to improve the technical condition of existing irrigated land on 670,000 hectares. The agrarian sector will receive 137,000 tractors and 120,000 trucks. Industry plans to assimilate for agriculture more than 380 different new models of machinery. In order to manage that tremendous potential economically, it is necessary to considerably intensify the work to increase the effectiveness of the system of vegetable husbandry, to complete the assimilation of crop rotations, to improve zonal technological schemes, and to introduce new intensive varieties.

Unfortunately, on every fifth part of the plowland, vegetable husbandry continues to be carried out in an unsystematic manner. In Turgay, Semipalatinsk, Ural, and other oblasts, violations occur in the technological scheme for maintaining fallow land and for applying fertilizers, and disdain is shown toward sowing anti-erosion crops. Only half the available organic fertilizers are applied to the soil.

The proper order has not yet been introduced on the irrigated land. Every year 40,000-80,000 hectares of that land remain unwatered. And, indeed, how can that be done if, at the peak of summer on the farms in Dzhambul Oblast only about 40 percent of the sprinkler trucks and one-fourth of the power-pump equipment were operating? Similar situations occurred in Chimkent and Alma-Ata oblasts.

As was noted in the report, animal husbandry requires energetic and effective measures. In development of that branch the extensive factors continue to predominate on many farms. The increased number of livestock does not correspond to the existing fodder base. The main thing is being overlooked -- the increase in the productivity of the livestock.

In 1985 the situation with milk procurements was somewhat corrected, and each cow produced 1,993 kg of milk. But that was the 1970 level! The average turnover weight of one head of cattle last year was 344 kg, or 60 percent less than in 1980, and in Kustanay, Aktyubinsk, Taldy-Kurgan, and Semipalatinsk oblasts it dropped from 70 to 109. There was a 3-kg decrease in the turnover weight of sheep and a decrease of 400 grams in the amount of wool shorn.

Special decrees concerning the intensification of measures to combat tuberculosis and brucellosis in animals, which decrees were adopted by the Kazakh Communist Party Central Committee and the Council of Ministers in 1978, 1979, and 1981, because of the lack of proper supervision on the part of the republic's party and soviet agencies, have remained unfulfilled. As of today, there are still many farms that have cattle and are not safe from those diseases. The share of sick animals in our republic exceeds by 5-6 times the average level for the country as a whole. As a consequence, the processing enterprises annually receive a large number of infected livestock, and more than a third of the milk is from unsafe animal farms. During the past five years, sovkhozes and kolkhozes turned over to the state in an emaciated condition and below the average fatness rate 20 percent of the cattle and more than 40 percent of the sheep. This led, as a whole, to the lowering of quality and underreceipt by the farms of more than R650 million.

Therefore one cannot speak about any successes in animal husbandry. On the contrary, in this area we have lost the positions previously won and during the 5-year period there was an underfulfillment of 385,000 tons of meat in live weight, compared to the plan, as well as underfulfillment of 152,000 tons of milk and almost 6,000 tons of wool. If we had only preserved the productivity of the animals at least at the 1980 level, then the 5-year plan for the turnover of meat could have been fulfilled, and the plan for milk and wool could have been overfulfilled. Understandably, that level of management of the development of animal husbandry is far from the requirements expressed by Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev at the conference in Tselinograd.

In order to reverse the situation as rapidly as possible, it is necessary more actively and more decisively to continue the work that has been begun recently to improve the animal farms, to improve the status of selection and bloodline work, and to raise the potential productivity of the animals, using valuable domestic and foreign breeds. The increase in the production of lamb and wool will be obtained basically by means of the intensive factors. And for that purpose, on the sheep-raising farms, it is necessary to create a reliable fodder base, primarily on the basis of increasing the productivity of arid pastures and increasing their water supplies.

It is necessary for us to increase considerably the return from the fodder field, and to reduce the losses of grasses during harvesting, transporting, and storage. It is necessary to build silo and haylage structures, to make broader use of bacterial and chemical preservatives, and to increase the amount of land planted to legume crops, sugar beets grown as fodder, other root crops, and early varieties of corn.

I would like to emphasize that solving the problem of the fodder base cannot tolerate any temporizing. In the 11th 5-Year Plan the annual expenditure per standard head of livestock was 24 quintals of fodder units, of which the share of concentrates was less than one-fifth, which is considerably less than even the amount in the 9th 5-Year Plan. The protein shortage in the fodders was as much as 20 percent; sugar, 30; and phosphorus, 34.

Of course, we are talking not about feeding the animals only with concentrates, but also about assuring that they are present within the optimal limits in the animal rations. Meanwhile it is no secret to anyone that frequently, for the sake of high-sounding reports, we forced the farms to forgo forage, reducing their volumes to one-half the need, or in some places even less than that, as was justly mentioned here by Comrade Miller. One can understand the dissatisfaction of the administrators and specialists when farms were forced, as a result of the fact, to sell barley in excess of the plan at 78 rubles a ton, and then to buy it from the government at 110 rubles. During the past 5 years alone, our republic received from state resources 3.3 million tons of non-allocation forage. But the people of Semipalatinsk and Alma-Ata bought more grain and combined fodders than they sold.

Naturally, this situation with the fodder base could not fail to alarm the workers in the local party and Soviet agencies. However, they were not brave enough to strive for any decisive changes. The battle was won by the habit that has developed over a period of many years -- the habit of conducting business along the well-trodden path.

Comrades, major tasks will have to be resolved by the workers in the processing branches of the republic's APK [agroindustrial complex]. By 1990 the production of output at enterprises of the food, fruit-and-vegetable, and meat-and-dairy industries will increase by 21.9 percent; the fish industry, by 7.8; and the milling-and-hulling and combined-fodder industries, by 15.2 percent. These branches will receive 879 million rubles of capital investments, or almost twice as much as in the past 5-year plan, for development. We shall build new enterprises and remodel the existing enterprises for the processing of milk, meat, and fruits and vegetables, as well as bread plants and confectionery factories.

The increase in the production of canned fruits and vegetables by a factor of 2.2, as well as the considerable buildup of the production of juices and nonalcoholic beverages, requires a necessary raw-materials base. Yet, during the past 5-year period the sovkhozes and kolkhozes underdelivered, compared to the plan targets, 259,000 tons of fruit, 128,000 tons of grapes, and 240,000 tons of vegetables. Our southern oblasts -- Alma-Ata, Dzhambul, Chimkent, and Kzyl-Orda oblasts -- which have at their disposal the necessary irrigated areas and labor resources, have been called upon to provide fruit and vegetable output for the entire republic. Instead of that, they themselves are becoming areas that ship in produce from the northern oblasts. And the people in Chimkent Oblast even contrived, at the peak of the vegetable season, to leave the oblast center without any vegetables. One can no longer take a tolerant attitude to paradoxes such as this.

There is something else that is occurring. Since 1970 the areas in our republic's orchards and berry farms have been reduced by 15,000 hectares, including 7000 in Alma-Ata Oblast -- although, in the reports, they have been increasing from year to year.

And something else again. Astrakhan technological schemes, which are known throughout the country, in combination with the devices created by Kazakhstan craftsmen, have reduced by almost one-half the need for workers in vegetable-growing, have reduced the production costs, and have increased the harvest yields. However, in Alma-Ata, Chimkent, Taldy-Kurgan, and Dzhambul oblasts those technological schemes are, for the time being, the domain of individual enthusiasts only.

An important reserve for supplementing the food resources is the individual citizen's personal plot and the enterprises' subsidiary farms. We must show constant concern for them and render them all kinds of assistance.

Comrades, it is planned that R17.8 billion on the whole be channelled to development of the agroindustrial complex by drawing on all sources. Now the chief task is to guarantee a high return on that investment. For the time being, however, the situation leaves much to be desired. During the past ten years the capital investments in rural areas exceeded 32 billion rubles, the production assets increased by a factor of 1.8, deliveries of fertilizers by a factor of 2.4, but the gross output of the farm increased only 23 percent.

Nor has there been a rise in labor productivity.

On our republic's sovkhozes from 1981-1984 the production costs per quintal of milk increased by 7 rubles; beef by 71; pork by 31; and lamb by 32 rubles. And how could those products costs have failed to rise, if last year an inspection by the Council of Ministers determined that on almost every third farm in Kzyl-Orda, Turgay, and Aktyubinsk Oblasts there had been instances of shortages and failure to report livestock in accounting records. In the communal herd in those oblasts alone, 23,000 head of cattle, 130,000 sheep, and almost 10,000 horses belonging to private individuals were being illegally maintained. The flocks on just the Zhenishkekum Sovkhoz, Kzyl-Orda Oblast, for example, contained approximately 400 sheep belonging to managers and specialists. To make partial restitution of the expenses, the owners of the personal livestock in the oblasts mentioned have paid into the state treasury more than one million rubles. Several people have been charged with criminal acts.

Because of instances of embezzlement and theft, the sovkhozes in our republic during the five-year period underaccounted almost 120,000 head of cattle, more than 1.7 million sheep, 42,000 horses, and 42,000 hogs.

It is especially alarming that these flagrant facts failed to receive any strict, well-principled evaluation either at the local party and soviet agencies, or at the former Ministry of Agriculture. This apparently is the result of the fact that an official memorandum for the People's Control Committee failed to evoke any reaction on the part of the Bureau or Secretariat, although the total amount of embezzlements and thefts in those oblasts during a 14-month period alone came to more than 26 million rubles.

Gosagroprom (Comrade Gukasov) and its oblast and rayon links must take decisive steps to correct the state of affairs in the outlying areas and to improve the style and methods of management. For this purpose they today have at their disposal all the rights and material capabilities.

Development of Production of Consumer Goods and the Services Sphere

Comrades, all our efforts to intensify the development of the economy are aimed, in the final analysis, at raising the standard of living of Soviet citizens. Therefore the fulfillment -- by enterprises of industry and the service sphere -- of the assignments in the Comprehensive Program for Development of the Production of Consumer Goods and the Service Sphere is of fundamental importance. That was mentioned in detail at a recent meeting of the republic's activists.

The increase that has been planned for the 5-year plan in the volumes of production of consumer goods (group B) to R9.5 billion, with an increase of 26.4 percent, will make it possible to satisfy more completely the needs of the public for fabrics, clothing, footwear, and many other commodities. Today, when people have been provided with sufficiently large numbers of articles for daily and long-term use, there have been sharp increases in demands for the quality of the articles being produced. The fundamental improvement in quality is a tremendous economic and political task. And yet industry, especially light industry, continues to produce an excessive amount of commodities with a low consumer level, whereas there are few good-quality ones that people want. And as a consequence, with the overall increase in the commodity reserves, for some types there is an acute shortage and for others an overstocking.

Paid services for the public will increase by a factor of 1.3. There will be considerable increases in the volume of work to repair household appliances, furniture, footwear, and clothing, and to repair or build housing, structures for orchard-growers, and cooperative garages for the citizens' privately owned transportation.

It is necessary to strive constantly for a situation in which all enterprises, regardless of the department to which they belong, participate in the production of commodities and the rendering of services. The oblast executive committee and the Alma-Ata City Executive Committee bear the full responsibility for providing the public with commodities and services. The center of gravity in this work is shifting to persistent implementation of those broad rights that have been given to the soviets. They must show themselves to be fully competent and demanding managers.

In light industry it is planned that output increase 19.7 percent -- including fabrics, 19.1 percent; garments (based on the normative cost of handling them), 19.7 percent; and stockings and hosiery, by 50 percent. The development of the Minlegprom [Ministry of Light Industry] system will receive 584 million rubles of capital investments, of which more than half will be used for technical re-equipping.

The production of commodities intended for cultural, everyday, and household use will increase 51.3 percent and in 1990 will come to almost 1.4 billion rubles. We shall produce more furniture, porcelain-earthenware and enameled dishes, commodities of household chemistry, sound recorders, children's bicycles, and toys.

The volume of retail commodity turnover during the 5-year period will increase 20 percent. The construction of large-scale specialized stores will be combined with the development of a network of small sales outlets in housing areas and at production enterprises. Mintorg [Ministry of Trade], Kazpotrebsoyuz [Kazakhstan Union of Consumer Cooperatives], the oblast executive committees, and the Alma-Ata Executive Committee must take all steps to introduce progressive forms of trade, to raise its level of efficiency, to react in a time-responsive manner and shift the commodity resources that are available, to improve the work of the wholesale link, and to reinforce the communication with industry.

In a word, the party line here is absolutely clear: It is necessary to guarantee the accelerated development of all branches and links in the economy that are involved in the production of consumer goods and the providing of services for Soviet citizens.

Development of Transport and Communication

Comrades, in the past 5-year period the development of our republic's national economy was unfavorably influenced by the imprecise operation of railroads, especially the Alma-Ata Railroad. In the current year promising changes have been planned. Those changes must be reinforced and further developed.

The shipping of freight by railroad in the 12th 5-Year Plan will increase 13.7 percent. In the sectors with the highest freight loads, the handling capacity with regard to the amount of rolling stock and the amount of freight and passengers will increase. Completion of construction of the Makat-Inder railroad, the activation of 1,100 km of second tracks, and the electrification of 1,487 km of railroad mainlines is planned.

The increase in the volume of shipments by general-purpose motor transport was 13.5 percent. There was a noticeable improvement in the structure of passenger motor transport and a reinforcement of its repair base. We shall see outstripping rates of development in the passenger hauls within the cities by streetcars and trolleybuses. The construction of a subway will begin in Alma-Ata. There will be a substantial increase in the hauls of passengers and freight by air transport.

In river transport it is planned that the complete mechanization of loading and unloading operations, and the remodeling of a number of ports and ship-repair and shipbuilding enterprises will be expanded.

The railroad administrations, Minavtotrans [Ministry of Motor Transport], Glavrechflot [Main Administration of the River Fleet], and the Kazakh Administration of Civil Aviation must take steps to achieve fundamental improvement of the organizations of shipments and prompt delivery of freight to the places of destination -- to guarantee traffic safety and to improve the efficiency of the services provided to the passengers en route and at terminals.

The volume of communication services will increase 31 percent. The number of people in the republic who will receive the Central Television program will be 97 percent of the total population, including 95 percent of the rural population. A matter that requires special attention is providing telephone services for the public, primarily for the apartments of disabled individuals and participants in the war; a large number of their requests continue to be unsatisfied.

Capital investments for the development of all types of transport and communication will be R3.3 billion.

The total length of highways with hard surfaces will increase during the 5-year plan from 78,000 km to almost 84,000 km. Practical life shows us that the organizations of the Kazakh SSR Minavtodor [Ministry of Highways] have been failing to observe many of the requirements pertaining to technological methods in construction and have been allowing poor quality road repair and maintenance work, and these situations have been leading to the premature deterioration and deformation of the roadbed and to the formation of potholes and dips. Minister Comrade Bekbulatov must take decisive steps to discontinue instances such as this, which were caused by the race for false economy, a race which, in the final analysis, causes a considerable amount of harm to the national economy.

Capital Construction

Comrades, one of the fundamental problems that determines the buildup of our republic's economic potential and the practical carrying out of the plans for acceleration of scientific-technical progress is the improvement of the state of affairs in capital construction. The measures planned for that area are high growth rates, intensification of the concentration of resources, and better providing of the branch with materials and machinery.

In the 11th 5-Year Plan, because of the low organization of operations and other serious shortcomings, as was already mentioned, more than R2.7 billion in state capital investments were underused. Construction on many projects far exceeded deadlines for completion, and the areas of incomplete work that occurred hindered normal operation of the new capacities and structures.

The responsibility for the unsatisfactory state of affairs in capital construction is also borne by the government. We are taking a series of steps to overcome the shortcomings. On the recommendation of the Council of Ministers, two ministers have been relieved of their duties: Minister of the Construction of Enterprises for Heavy Industry, Comrade Lomov, and Minister of the Construction-Materials Industry, Comrade Parimbetov. At the same time, frankly speaking, the failure to fulfill the assignments of the 5-year plan in that branch is also the result of the fact that the Central Committee Bureau and Secretariat reduced the demands they made on the party's oblast committees.

None of the oblast committee secretaries who spoke here mentioned their responsibility for the underuse of tremendous capital investments in the past 5-year plan: in Karaganda Oblast, almost R330 million; in East Kazakhstan and Pavlodar oblasts, R280 million each; in Kzyl-Orda Oblast, approximately R100 million; and for [the city of]

Alma-Ata, R300 million. Many projects remained unactivated in each oblast because of the fact that, for example, Karaganda Oblast (Comrades Korkin and Inkarbayev) undershipped 1.4 million tons of cement to customers. You can judge for yourselves where we could have got that cement. For that reason the activation of a number of major projects in our republic was disrupted. The fact of the matter is that the Novo-Karagandinskiy Cement Plant was accepted despite the fact that there were areas of incomplete design work in the equipment, as well as construction-planning errors. To eliminate them the government allocated for the oblasts everything that was needed; but matters still did not improve.

In the new 5-year plan, R9.1 billion more than was used in the past will be invested in developing the economy of Kazakhstan. This requires the maintenance of a high level of investment activity. It will be necessary to activate a number of major industrial enterprises and capacities that are of great national-economic importance.

In housing construction, the assigned tasks include raising the level of comfort and amenities in apartments and the improvement of layout and architectural-construction decisions. Enterprises specializing in large-panel housing construction will be built in Guryev, Zarechnoye in the Alma-Ata area; Zhayrem, Dzhezkazgan Oblast; and Oktyabrskoye, Aktyubinsk Oblast. Such enterprises will be expanded in Karaganda, Ust-Kamenogorsk, Balkhash, Petropavlovsk, and Kzyl-Orda.

Almost R1.1 billion in capital investments are being channeled into reinforcement of the construction industry -- with the first-priority creation of capacities for the production of highly effective materials and structurals that contribute to increased labor productivity, reduced construction time, and increased industrialization of construction.

Mintyazhstroy (Comrade Makiyevskiy), Minmontazhspetsstroy (Comrade Yezhikov-Babakhanov, Glavalmaatastroy (Comrade Krasikov), and Minstroymaterialov (Comrade Beysenov) will have to take under their strict supervision the placing of the maximum work load on the production capacities, the carrying out of the technical re-equipping and remodeling of the existing enterprises and the construction of new ones in the construction industry that have been stipulated in the USSR Council of Ministers decree adopted at the request of the republic. These questions must also be the object of constant attention on the part of the local party and soviet agencies.

The direct duty of the party committees, the soviet and trade-union agencies, as well as the apparatus of the Kazakh SSR Gosstroy is to guarantee broad introduction into the construction process of the achievements of science, technology, and advanced practice, and considerable acceleration of the periods of time required for erecting projects, reducing their costs, and improving their quality.

Our republic's Gosplan and ministries and departments, and the oblast executive committees, must carefully examine, once again, the lists of projects for the 12th 5-Year Plan, having in mind the reduction of the newly begun projects, and to put into mothball status those projects whose construction is not required by first-priority necessity.

In our republic we have not yet seen the complete elimination of the practice of unplanned construction. Stroybank institutions alone succeeded in locating during the past 5-year plan 47 unplanned projects with an estimated cost of R13 million. For example, in Dzhezkazgan in 1985, without the authorization of the union government, an enclosed swimming pool was built, and an administrative building at the Dzhezkazgantyazhstroy Trust was erected under the guise of a dormitory. At the same time the extremely necessary machinery-repair base at the Dzhezkazgan Mining and Metallurgical Combine, the low rates of construction of which were mentioned as long ago as the 15th Congress, has been in the process of construction for 21 years, instead of the normal 18 months. As of today, more than one-third of the volume of construction-installation has not been fulfilled, and one-of-a-kind equipment valued at one million rubles has been lying in warehouses since 1980.

Instances of unplanned construction were also revealed in Guryev, Kokchetav, Kustanay, North Kazakhstan, and other oblasts. We assume that it is high time for the party and Soviet agencies in the outlying areas to put an end to such crude disregard for state planning discipline.

Frequently the reason for the appearance of unplanned projects is efforts by certain managers to have so-called "prestige" projects, whatever the cost. This practice, which was censured by the CPSU Central Committee, has become widespread in Chimkent, Karaganda, and East Kazakhstan oblasts. In Alma-Ata, at the insistence of the previous management of the party's oblast committee and city committee, Glavalmaatastroy -- by using all-out rates under conditions of a shortage of material and labor resources for other projects intended for social, cultural, and everyday needs -- constructed ahead of schedule a Central State Museum at a cost of R9.3 million. During individual periods, the concentration of people at that allegedly "vitaliy" needed structure reached 1,000 persons. Although the museum was handed over in June 1985, it was opened to the public literally a few days ago.

Similar methods were used to erect other structures in the capital in the "prestige" category. Without a doubt, those structures are not unnecessary for Alma-Ata. But it is necessary first of all to build housing, for which the 5-year plan for the city was underfulfilled by almost 115,000 square meters.

As we know from an item in PRAVDA, in Saryagach, Chimkent Oblast, the Chimkentselstroy-25 Trust built -- without any documentation, hurriedly, and in the guise of a 12-apartment building -- a comfortable detached building intended for special purposes. The building contained luxury rooms and was equipped with imported furniture and expensive rugs and apparatus. When it came time to assume responsibility for it, the chairman of the Chimkent Oblast Executive Committee, Comrade Dzhandosov, stated that he knew nothing about it. It may be that he is right: a large number of similar items were built under the eyes of the oblast leadership. And it is not surprising that one of them, with a value of more than R500,000 could simply be overlooked. According to the available data, one of the first persons to relax there proved to be Gosstroy Chairman Comrade Bektemisov whose job should have included discontinuing such excesses in construction.

Certain comrades consider it a disgrace to live in ordinary buildings. Instead, they ask to be provided with a house built according to a special plan, so the ceiling can be a bit higher and there can be a bit more space. It was precisely with that grand sweep that the Dzhambul Oblast Executive Committee built a 6-unit apartment building to which the oblast leadership moved. Isn't this a manifestation of arrogance and a desire to emphasize one's superiority over everyone else -- attitudes that the party is decisively fighting against today? Unfortunately, these prideful attitudes were rapidly transmitted to many managers in the rayons and farms, imbuing in them features that are incompatible with the outlook of a Communist Party member; and this ends, not infrequently, with them losing not only respect and authority in the work collectives, but, in the final analysis, their jobs as well.

At this point one cannot fail to mention those suburban residences and luxurious detached homes that were built in the oblasts allegedly to house honored guests, but which stand idle for months at a time, awaiting the infrequent residents. A large number of people and a lot of money are required to maintain them. The working class from which many of the administrators have come, and which has brought up those administrators, has a right to be surprised and legally indignant at such manorial ways.

Until recently only East Kazakhstan Oblast was "lagging behind" in this respect, and its administrators decided also to distinguish themselves, as a result of which they became the object of sharp and justified criticism by IZVESTIYA.

I must say that during the past 5-year plan, as a result of the shortage of capacities at the construction organizations, working hands, and material resources, our republic has completed approximately 1.2 million square meters of housing less than planned, thus depriving approximately 20,000 families of the joy of moving into a new apartment. Therefore I am convinced that a well-principled raising of the question of the inadmissibility of diverting funds for the purpose of various excesses, fashionable projects, and the vain, false conceit of individual administrators will find the understanding and support of the delegates to the congress. The sooner we introduce order into this matter, the greater the benefit will be, both for indoctrination purposes and in the sense of order and discipline.

Raising the Public's Standard of Living

Comrades, true to its highest goal, the party in the draft of the Basic Guidelines plans a broad social program that makes it possible to create better conditions for reinforcing the material and spiritual foundations of the Soviet way of life and for developing the new man.

In the 12th 5-Year Plan, the social consumption funds in our republic will rise by 20-22 percent; the real income per-capita of population by 13-15; and average monthly wages by 11-13 percent. Further raising the national standard of living will also be promoted by implementation of the Food Program and the Comprehensive Program for Commodities and Services.

In order to provide the public with housing from all sources of financing, including housing-construction cooperatives, it is planned that homes with a total area of 34 million square meters, or 2.5 million more than in the past 5-year plan, be built. That means that every seventh family will receive a new, well-designed apartment. A gradual changeover to building of homes on the basis of "new-generation" plans that improve the quality of the mass construction of housing and its comfort level is planned. At the present time it is necessary to take steps everywhere to assure complete use of the capital investments that have been allocated for these purposes.

Continuing the discussion begun in the report of the Central Committee -- the discussion of the serious shortcomings in the construction of housing and the providing of housing to the public -- one cannot fail to mention today the distressing instances of violation of the principles of social justice during the distribution of apartments. And yet this is the sacred duty primarily of the soviet agencies. Because they crudely ignored the housing legislation, several officials were removed from the positions they occupied -- the first secretaries of the city committees and chairmen of the city executive committees of Kokchetav and Kzyl-Orda, the chairman of the Dzhambul City Executive Committee, and a number of others.

Great liberties were taken and outrages were committed in Alma-Ata. As was shown by an inspection, during the past 2.5 years the city's rayon executive committees, in distributing the housing that had been completed in the city, channeled only one percent of it to meet the needs of persons with their names on a waiting list. The city's executive committee failed to allocate to disabled war veterans a single square meter from its own construction.

With the consent and participation of the city soviet, it became a widespread practice for the administrators of the ministries, enterprises, and organizations to issue apartments on the black market. It must be admitted frankly that the inspection revealed a large number of instances where the city soviet issued housing without any consideration of the person's location on the waiting list, simply on the basis of oral or written instructions issued by certain persons occupying high positions.

With the connivance of the party and soviet agencies in the city, it became the custom for the administrative workers, when going on a trip to another location, to leave their apartments to relatives and friends. That was done, in particular, by the former first secretary of the party's city committee, Comrade Zhakupov, and the former department chief of Council of Ministers, Comrade Shendaulova. A person who was able to resolve with astonishing ease the housing problems of his close friends and relatives was former Deputy Minister of Housing and Municipal Management Comrade Kisanov. For example, his brother-in-law was given, for a family of four persons, a five-room apartment with an area of 125 square meters, and Comrade Mukhamed-Rakhimov, by drawing on the funds of the Gosplan that he managed, lavishly provided well-appointed housing to chiefs and his children's acquaintances, as well as his own friends. Chairman of the Alma-Ata Oblast Executive Committee, Comrade Belyakov, because of his position had no particular difficulty in transferring his three-room apartment to his children so that he and his wife could move to a new four-room apartment. And Comrade Abenov, who was made chairman of the East Kazakhstan Oblast Executive Committee, has not even relinquished his Alma-Ata apartment since 1982, although he has an apartment in Ust-Kamenogorsk.

The enumeration of such examples, comrades, would take a large amount of time. One might have failed to mention such outrages if they had not been of such a widespread nature.

And all of this is being done under conditions when, in the capital, almost 3,000 families of disabled veterans and participants in the war, or of military personnel who died in the war, do not have well-appointed apartments, and many families that need them have been waiting more than 20 years. Incidentally, it is typical that certain high officials attempt to find apartments for their friends and relatives necessarily in the center of town and necessarily in new buildings with improved floor plans and finishing details. People use rights and nonrights to achieve this. I shall speak plainly when I say that all this immediately requires a special investigation to ascertain any possible instances of malfeasance.

One would scarcely think that to sacrifice his high moral ideals for the sake of petty Philistine considerations makes a Communist look good. One cannot speak one way, calling upon people to take proper action, and then act in another way. It may be that the criticism expressed today will seem sharp to some persons, but without a frank, well-principled party approach to the evaluation of such negative situations, we shall not achieve their complete eradication or people's awareness that the law applies identically to everyone. I think that the delegates to this congress share that opinion.

Comrades, in the new 5-year plan, areas that will receive further development are centralized water and heat supplies for the cities and workers' settlements, expanded construction of sewerage structures with a complete set of procedures for the purification of runoff water, and increased gasification and gas supply for the populated places.

Minzhilkomkhoz [Ministry of the Housing and Municipal Management] and the executive committees of the soviets must achieve a significant improvement in the quality and efficiency of municipal services provided to the public, improved maintenance of the housing fund, the guaranteeing of proper water supplies, and effective use of the funds allocated for the improvement of living conditions.

Measures are planned for developing institutions of culture and art and a public education system, and for intensifying their role in the formation of a Marxist-Leninist political philosophy, in more completely satisfying the increased spiritual needs of the people. There will be an expansion of the network of mass libraries and club institutions, and sports structures and their material-technical base will be reinforced. There will be a substantial rise in the level of services provided by television and radio, and by enterprises in the printing industry.

Considering the school reform being carried out, our republic will have to build general-educational schools for 529,500 students. The level of training of the students for participation in socially beneficial labor will rise.

The scientific-technical revolution and the qualitatively new stage approaching in the development of Soviet society make high demands on the competency and intellectual potential of the specialists in the national economy. Hence one of the chief tasks of the higher and secondary school system is to improve the training process on the basis of modern technical means, to increase the number of graduates who have specialized in new areas of science and technology, and to develop in the upcoming generation breadth of thought and a high sense of duty.

In connection with the growing needs for skilled cadres of workers, we are reinforcing the training-materials base of the vocational and technical schools, where the student contingent will exceed 309,000 persons.

The network of children's preschool institutions will increase by almost 120,000 places, which is one-third more than the increase in the past 5-year plan. It is planned that about half of them will be activated by drawing on funds provided by enterprises, and in this matter an important role will be played by the local soviets.

A large amount of attention is being devoted to developing the therapeutic and other medical institutions. Considering the increase in the population and the partial replacement of decrepit buildings, it is planned that solely by drawing on state capital investments, hospitals with 13,200 beds will be activated. It is necessary to intensify the preventive trend in public health, to reinforce its primary links, especially in rural localities, to improve medical aid for women and children, to guarantee that the entire population will be provided with dispensary treatment, and to introduce into practice the achievements of modern science and new methods of diagnostics and treatment. It is planned that new sanitoriums, disease-prevention centers, tourist bases, and mass recreation zones for the workers will be built and existing ones will be expanded.

In the past 5-year plan the plans for activation of projects intended for social, cultural, and everyday purposes were fulfilled only in 1985, and as a whole, as was previously mentioned, there was a considerable lag. Therefore it is important, from the very beginning of this 5-year period, without losing any time, to devote constant attention to fulfillment of the plans.

The social security agencies must improve the work of observing pension legislation and of providing benefits and advantages established for participants in the Great Patriotic War, and veterans of labor and the USSR Armed Forces.

When carrying out the measures in the social program, it is necessary to remember that they promote not only a rise in the national standard of living, but also increased effectiveness in social production by means of an increase in the labor and creative participation of Soviet citizens.

Protection of the Environment

Comrades, problems that are becoming increasingly acute are the problems of efficient use of natural resources and the protection of the environment. However, there have been many instances where ministries and enterprise managers have been refraining from resolving them, and have resorted instead to endless speechmaking. In this regard, for example, a ministry that deserves special reproach is Minkhimprom [Ministry of the Chemical Industry], which for dozens of years has failed to take any major steps to prevent the pollution of sources of water by the Karbid Association in Temirtau and by the Chrome Compounds Plant in Aktyubinsk.

It is proposed that more than R50 million of capital investments be channeled into environmental-protection projects. There will be an acceleration of the recultivation of land that has been exhausted, and expanded application of the soil-protecting system of vegetable husbandry. Steps will be taken to reproduce our republic's forest wealth, and to protect our forests against fires and pests. It is planned that a natural park and three preserves with an area of approximately 500,000 hectares will be created.

Development of the Oblasts and the Territorial-Production Complexes

In the new 5-year plan and in the long-term period it is planned that the economy in every oblast of our republic be developed. Consideration will be taken to assure the more complete use of their production potential and natural and labor resources, and to improve the production and nonproduction infrastructure.

Higher growth rates in industry are planned in Ural, Chimkent, Curyev, and Aktyubinsk oblasts.

In Kzyl-Orda Oblast, projects will be continued to reorganize the irrigation systems in the lower reaches of the Syr-Darya River, and to construct the Aral-Sarybulak and right-bank Kzyl-Orda group water mainlines. There will be an increase in the capacities of the plant that produces rice-harvesting machines.

In Turgay Oblast the activation of a garment factory and bread-products combines is planned. In the long-term view, the formation of a fuel and energy complex will begin there, as well as the open-pit mining of coal at the Orlevskoye deposit in the Turgay Basin.

In Kokchetav Oblast, capacities for the extraction of ore will be activated at the Vasilkovskiy GOK [mining and concentration combine] and for the production of substitutes for whole milk and cheese at the Kokchetav Dairy Combine. The construction of a series of structures for feeding water to Kokchetavskiy, Shchuchinskiy, and Makinskiy rayons and to the Borovskoy Resort Zone will continue.

In the Ural Oblast, as was previously mentioned, it is planned that intensive assimilation of the Karachaganak gas-condensate deposit, and a milling plant at Zhelayevo station and a combined-fodder plant will be activated.

Steps have been planned in the republic for the development of small and medium-sized cities and rayon centers, where small specialized enterprises and branches and shops of existing plants and factories will be situated, as well as enterprises that are linked with the providing of services to agriculture, with the processing of its output, and with the production of articles from local raw materials.

We shall see the continuation of the process of buildup of the potential of the existing territorial-production complexes and the formation of new ones. In the Pavlodar-Ekibastuz complex, capacities will be activated at the Ekibastuz GRES-2, and the tractor plant, petroleum refinery, aluminum plant, and Ekibastuzugol Association will receive further development. In addition to the branches that are traditional for that complex, enterprises in the building-materials industry, the woodworking industry, and light and food industry will develop.

In the Karatau-Dzhambul complex, by means of an increase in the capacities for the extraction of ore in the Karatau Basin and the assimilation of new deposits, the raw-materials base of the mineral-fertilizers industry will grow, increasing the role of the complex as the country's second base for phosphate raw materials.

In the Mangyshlak complex, it is planned that there will be further assimilation of deposits of petroleum on Buzachi Peninsula, and increased output at the Shevchenko Plastics Plant. The formation and development of the Karaganda-Temirtau, East Kazakhstan, Turgay, and Chimkent-Kentau territorial-production complexes will continue.

Gosplan, the republic's scientific institutions, and the local party and Soviet agencies are overlooking a large number of opportunities for further improvement of the placement of productive forces by means of the more efficient use of mineral raw materials and other natural resources, especially in the West Kazakhstan region.

Improving the Economic Mechanism and Administration

Comrades, in order to resolve the large-scale tasks that have been presented by the party, it is necessary to reorganize the economic mechanism in order to give great scope to the tremendous creative forces contained in our economy. In his report at the April 1985 plenum of the CPSU Central Committee, M.S. Gorbachev emphasized: "There is only one way out of this situation: we need immediate and energetic measures for the entire series of problems of administration." The CPSU Central Committee and the USSR Council of Ministers have already made a number of fundamental decisions in this direction. Many branches have been changed over to new management conditions.

At the present time in our republic these conditions are being completely used in the systems of Minsvyaz [Ministry of Communication], Minavtotrans [Ministry of Motor Transport], and Minbyt [Ministry of Municipal Services], as well as many enterprises in industry. In the current year they will be used to produce more than half, and starting in 1987 all, the industrial output of Kazakhstan.

Gosplan and the ministries and departments are required to guarantee that all steps are taken to reinforce cost accountability and to implement in practice the measures for increasing the self-interestedness of the labor collectives in working with a smaller number of people, in economically using resources, and in accelerating scientific-technical process. Intensification of the role of economic methods must be combined with an improvement of the organizational structure of administration.

During recent years much has been done in this regard in our republic. There has been an increase in the number of production and scientific-production associations and in the level of concentration and specialization. At a number of ministries and departments the middle link has been abolished, and that has made it possible to change over to the two-link structure of administration, and to increase the independence and responsibility of the primary link.

The economic benefit from improving the administration of the economy subordinate to the Kazakh SSR Council of Ministers during the past 5-year plan came to 226 million rubles.

It is necessary to continue to carry out active work to eliminate duplication and parallelism in management at all levels, to expand the rights, and to intensify the responsibility of the republic and local agencies. This will help to achieve the more complete mobilization of internal reserves, to increase the rhythmic nature of production, and to reinforce contract discipline.

The economic mechanism and our daily practical work must be oriented more to increasing the role of the human factor. That means first of all achieving a precise organization of production, and keeping the losses of work time to the minimum; second, it means introducing in a broad and well thought-out manner the brigade contract that has been found by the masses themselves, and creating conditions for the manifestation of all its advantages; and third, it means making conscientious labor and an initiative toward the job the chief gauge of the dignity and social prestige of every individual -- from the laborer to the minister.

The process of increasing the activity rate of the human factor pertains not only to the low-level executors. It also includes improvement of work style, probity among our administrative personnel, and thorough knowledge of the job at hand on the part of our administrative personnel. What kind of skillful management of the branch should one have expected from former Minister of the Fruit and Vegetable Management, Comrade DzheremLayev, who, by his incompetency and casual attitude, evoked only the ironic smiles of those around him?

Comrades, the party, Soviet, and economic agencies must decisively and consistently carry out their functions of guaranteeing the complete intactness of socialist property, and the eradication of all instances of theft, squandering, and mismanagement. We cannot leave at the rudder of administration those who do not meet these party requirements, or those who are not accustomed to keeping a count of the people's money or do not wish to do so. An especially intolerable situation has developed in consumer cooperatives, where -- as a result of the neglected state of accounting, low standards and miscalculations in the selection and assignment of personnel during the period when Comrade Tanekeyev was working as chairman of the board of Kazpotrebsoyuz -- major misappropriations of cooperative funds became a customary phenomenon. The total amount of the embezzlement and theft revealed in that system merely during the 4.5 years of the past 5-year plan exceeded R20 million rubles, and the unproductive expenses and losses exceeded more than 46 million.

In the Dzhezkazgan City Cooperative trade system, embezzlement and illegal expenses totaling R768,000 rubles were discovered. In the system of the Chimkent Oblast union of consumer cooperatives, last year R1.4 million rubles were misappropriated by persons committing acts of malfeasance. As a result of his having carried out massive padding of the figures and because of the broad extent of thefts and other economic schemes, the chairman of the Alma-Ata Oblast union of consumer cooperatives, Comrade Gorgopko, was removed from his assignment. Similar outrages have been occurring in other oblasts. It is necessary to fight decisively and mercilessly against them. One should not think that the law-enforcement agencies did not receive prompt warning reports about these violations. Unfortunately, they simply did not make a habit of nipping such crimes in the bud. It sometimes happens that their workers themselves make deals with individuals who steal from the people's wealth.

As you can see, whatever area we consider, it is necessary, over and over again, to talk about cadres of managers. Meanwhile, at the Kazakh Communist Party Central Committee there is no effective, time-tested reserve of such managers. Hence there are hurried decisions, there is a lack of joint action, and serious errors are made in personnel policy. Recently a large number of managers of party committees and ministries were removed from their positions only on insistence from above. That is, although we knew about their unworthy behavior and their failures on the job, we ourselves did not take any well-principled steps promptly. The new makeup of the Central Committee and its Bureau must work decisively to correct this situation.

The steps being taken by the party to guarantee a fundamental change in the economy, to improve the style and methods of administration, and to increase discipline and order and the civic self-awareness and responsibility of every member of society, in the final analysis, contribute to consolidation of those bulwarks on which the socialist way of life rests.

Comrade delegates, Soviet society is on a sharp upsurge. Our country has entered a critical phase in its development, when it is necessary to strive for profound qualitative changes both in production and in people's psychology. The plans for every republic constitute a component part of our common job. By implementing what has been planned in the single family of Soviet nations, and with the unselfish aid of the great Russian nation, we are making our contribution to the resolution of the nationwide tasks. In this dialectic we see the manifestation of the essence of socialist internationalism, and the basis of the further reinforcement of V.I. Lenin's behest -- the indissoluble friendship of fraternal republics.

The Communists and all the workers of Kazakhstan have taken active part in the discussion of the draft of the Basic Guidelines and have made a large number of valuable recommendations. The Council of Ministers has commissioned Gosplan, the ministries, departments, oblast executive committees, and the Alma-Ata City executive committees to consider them and take them into account when preparing the plans.

In order to achieve the goals stipulated in the draft of the Basic Guidelines, the party, soviet, and economic agencies, and the trade-union and Komsomol organizations of our republic must raise the level of organizing and indoctrination work in all branches and links of administration, at every work station. This will provide a powerful impetus to the growth of people's political and creative participation, and to their selfless work in the name of the further prosperity of our motherland.

Please allow me to express my firm conviction that the Communists and all the workers of our republic, mobilized by the well-principled and innovative decisions of the April 1985 plenum of the Central Committee, will meet the 27th CPSU Congress with high achievements in labor, will multiply their contribution to the acceleration of our country's social and economic development, and will apply all their efforts and energy for the carrying out of the stupendous plans of the Leninist Party.

UZBEK'S KADYROV ON 5-YEAR ECONOMIC PLAN

WA071516 Tashkent PRAVDA VOSTOKA in Russian 1 Feb 86 pp 5-6

[Unattributed report: "On the Draft Basic Guidelines for the Economic and Social Development of the USSR for 1986-1990 and the Period Through the Year 2000. The Report of G.Kh. Kadyrov, Chairman of the Uzbek SSR Council of Ministers"]

[Text] Comrade delegates. The upcoming 27th CPSU Congress will be an event of world-wide-historic importance signifying the start of a qualitatively new stage in the development of Soviet society. The concept drawn up by the CPSU Central Committee in the April (1985) Plenum for accelerating the country's socioeconomic development on the basis of scientific and technical progress has been embodied in the precongress documents.

More than 3 million people took place in the discussion of the Draft Basic Guidelines. Some 1,800 proposals were introduced, aimed at the dynamic development of our entire economy and improvements in the life of the Soviet people.

We must do everything necessary right from the beginning of the 5-year plan to make all labor collectives and all economic leaders aware of the scale of the tasks that have been set for the upcoming period, and of the high exactingness and requirements for their practical realization. Here, what is needed is not only a deep and objective assessment of what has been achieved in the past but also every possible restructuring of the style and methods of management at all levels.

I. The Main Results of Economic and Social Development in the Republic for 1981-1985

In accordance with the decisions of the 26th CPSU Congress and thanks to the daily concern and enormous assistance that the party and government give our republic, during the last 5-year plan more than R34 billion of capital investments were allocated to strengthen the material-technical base of the national economy and housing construction, social-cultural and other projects. More than 200 major production projects were commissioned and large areas of new irrigated land were brought into use. Fixed capital rose by a factor of 1.4 and about 30 million square meters of housing were built.

However, the republic did not reach the targets set by the 5-year plan. And, as was correctly noted in the accountability report of the Uzbek Communist Party Central Committee, during the period just ended unfavorable trends were seen in the republic's economic development. Gross blunders and miscalculations in the management of the national economy led to a decline in the level of efficiency in social production.

In critically evaluating the results of the last 5-year plan, it must be noted that the Council of Ministers, the ministries and administrations, the ispolkoms of the soviets of workers' deputies, and economic leaders failed to take adequate steps to make full use of available reserves and opportunities for accelerating economic growth. Scientifically sound management methods were sometimes replaced by arbitrary decisions which were often of a voluntarist nature, while numerous meetings and conferences were substituted for daily organizational work.

All this led ineluctably to shortcomings in economic development. Average annual growth rates for national income fell 2.7 points compared with the 10th 5-Year Plan, while the return on investment fell 17 percent in industry and 38 percent in agriculture. There was a shortfall of more than R3 billion in the national income.

Many economic leaders did not implement the plan properly, and often it was fulfilled at any cost. In industry there was a production shortfall of R500 million. The 5-year plan was not fulfilled by the Ministry of Local Industry, the Ministry of the Furniture and Wood Processing Industry, the Ministry of the Food Industry, the Ministry of the Meat and Dairy Industry, the Ministry of the Construction Materials Industry and some others. Major enterprises such as the Chirchik Elektrokhimprom Production Association (Comrade K.G. Sadykov), the Fergana Azot Association (Comrade M.V. Kutuyev), the Samarkand and Almalyk chemical plants (Comrades R.Ya. Yakubov and M.M. Mirkhodzhayev) and the Uzbek Metallurgical Plant failed to cope with set tasks.

The leaders of the Uzbek SSR Ministry of Power and Electrification, the Uzbekgidroenergostroy Trust, the Soyuzuzbekgazprom All-Union Production Association, the Main Administration for Central Asia Oil and Gas Construction, and the Sredazugol Production Association failed to implement exhaustive measures to provide stable supplies of electrical and thermal energy, gas, and fuel for enterprises and organizations and the public. The accident rate increased at thermal power stations, especially at the Syrdarya GRES and the Mubarek TETS. All this led to large losses in the national economy. Considerable lagging was permitted in construction of the Talimardzhan GRES and fundamental questions concerning development at the Novoangren thermal power station were left unresolved. The status of heat supplies in Tashkent and other major cities is a cause for serious concern.

During the last 5-year plan more than R1 billion of capital investments were allocated for development of the gas sector, and this made it possible, taking into account the replacement of withdrawn facilities, to increase gas production 8.5 billion cubic meters annually. In 1985, however, recovery and processing not only failed to increase but, on the contrary, declined. Stable labor collectives were not created, the training of skilled work cadres and specialists was not carried out efficiently, and social and everyday questions were not resolved.

Because of the grossest violations and failures to observe technological conditions and operating rules, there were frequent accidents and stoppages at the Murabek Gas Processing Plant and other projects. The Main Administration for Central Asia Oil and Gas Construction failed to ensure the timely commissioning of projects concerned with the recovery, processing, and transportation of gas. All this considerably complicated the operations of industrial enterprises, particularly those producing mineral fertilizers. As a result of serious miscalculations in planning and organizing work to develop the Angren Coal Field, especially in stripping operations, and because of poor use of mining and transport equipment, an exceptionally complicated situation developed with respect to coal supplies for the national economy. This led to the need to import coal from other regions and to major transportation expenses.

All of this became possible because the leaders in these sectors are not active enough in resolving questions concerning development prospects and the day-to-day affairs of production. M.S. Tashpulatov, A.K. Igrashev, A.R. Atadzhanov, A.I. Leleko, and the chief of the Main Administration for Central Asia Oil and Gas Construction must radically restructure leadership in the fuel-and-energy complex and provide reliable supplies of electric power and fuel for the national economy and the population's domestic needs.

Production capacities are loaded at a low level in the major sector of light industry. A total of R1.15 billion of capital investments, or 2.5 times more than during the 10th 5-Year Plan, was allocated for its development. Some 84 production facilities were commissioned, including 54 branches. However, at the Bukhara and Tashkent textile combines and the Khivinskiy Carpet combine are being used only 60 to 75 percent of capacity. Almost half of the branches built failed to cope with their plans and are still operating with a low return.

The light industry minister, M.Kh. Kurbanov, is providing only superficial leadership in the sector and does not investigate in depth the resolution of production-technical problems. He is also indifferent toward shortcomings in the work of many associations and enterprises, particularly in matters of introducing scientific and technical achievements which radically improve output quality, and create proper working and everyday conditions for workers. Paperwork and bureaucratic methods of leadership prevail in the activity of the ministry, its collegium, and the central apparatus. And there is much delay in resolving urgent questions.

Equipment at machine-building enterprises is also not being used to capacity. For a long time the shift coefficient has not risen above 1.36. The low level of use for NC machine tools and automatic lines is especially impermissible. Because of untimely capital repairs; failure to observe technological regulations; and inadequate skills on the part of maintenance personnel; frequent stoppages are being permitted at large-tonnage facilities for the production of triacetylcellulose, ammonia, carbamide, caprolactam, ammophos, and other products at enterprises of the USSR Ministry of Fertilizers. For a long time capacities for the production of steel and rolled ferrous metal have been underutilized at the Uzbek Metallurgical Plant.

It must be stated directly that such shortcomings would be much less if questions concerning operations at these enterprises were taken seriously by the leaders of the Fergana, Samarkand, and Tashkent oblispolkoms.

In assessing the status of construction production in the republic it must be acknowledged that this very important part of our economy has today become a bottleneck. Year after year, the capital construction plans are not fulfilled. During the 5-year plan fixed capital to the tune of R1 billion was not completed. Considerable assets are frozen in uncompleted construction and the above-normative remains of equipment and materials continue to grow, particularly in the Ministry of Construction and the Main Tashkent Construction Administration. All this has led to a serious complication of the financial position of contract ministries and administrations.

Capacities in large-panel housing construction are being used at a low level. In 1985 this indicator was 65 percent for the republic, 51 percent in the Uzbek SSR Ministry of Construction and 39 percent in the Ministry of Land Reclamation and Water Resources. In Gulistan, for example, only 26 percent of capacity is being used in the housing construction combine. Of course, it is primarily the leaders in the Ministry of Construction who are to blame for this. But what steps have been taken by the chairman of the Gulistan Gorispolkom, A.R. Razakbergenov? The same question could be asked of the Almalyk, Dzhizak, Urgench, and Karshi gorispolkoms, where the housing construction combines are also operating poorly and with serious shortcomings. The situation in construction has also worsened because many projects have been handed over and accepted with defects. This has caused great dissatisfaction among inhabitants moving into the new houses; and at production projects the startup of capacities has been delayed. This all indicates irresponsibility on the part of some leaders in the construction organizations and, moreover, it accustoms them to this disreputable style of work.

Nor must we pass over in silence the quite entrenched and shameful practice of deviating from projects, excesses in using assets and materials, and building projects not envisaged by the plan. Large amounts of materials and manpower are diverted for these purposes.

The Ministry of the Construction Materials Industry is operating far below its capacities. Minister G.G. Isayev very often makes promises from some dais and offers assurances that such and such steps will be taken. At the same time, each year at the construction projects considerable amounts of cement, brick, slate, and other materials are not provided. We see that his words are by no means always backed up with deeds.

Fulfillment of the main indicators for development in agriculture was not ensured. The average annual gross output rose 10 percent against a target of 17 percent, and processing per work declined 14 percent. The state failed to receive 1 million tons of raw cotton and considerable quantities of grain, meat, milk, and eggs.

Although R15.5 billion were invested in the development of agriculture during the last 5-year plan, the proper return was not forthcoming. Land fertility declined over large areas, particularly in the zone of new irrigation. Now, some 560,000 hectares, or almost 15 percent of irrigated arable land, is in unsatisfactory condition. This is the direct result of deviation from land reclamation projects; their commissioning with major imperfections; and lack of comprehensive construction at sovkhozes by the Main Administration for Central Asia Sovkhoz Construction, the Ministry of Land Reclamation and Water Resources, and the republic State Committee for Water Resources Construction. The local soviet and agricultural organs that embark on illegal construction projects and fail to ensure that irrigation and reclamation networks are maintained in good order are as much to blame.

We cannot tolerate the fact that each year about 5,000 hectares of irrigated arable land are withdrawn from agricultural use because of deterioration in reclamation work, use for construction, and other reasons.

Capacities for the production of meat and other livestock produce are being used unsatisfactorily. Poultry factories are operating at only 65 percent of capacity. The Zarbdar hog-raising complex in Dzhizak Oblast is producing only 35 percent of the meat that it could, while the Frunzenskiy hog-raising complex in Fergana Oblast is producing only 63 percent, and the industrial complex imeni 50-letiye SSR in Surkhan-Darya Oblast, which fattens cattle, is operating at only 20 percent capacity.

If the State Committee for the Poultry Industry (B.A. Piskunov), the Uzbek Main Administration for the Livestock Industry (L.P. Butikov), and the corresponding soviet and economic organs in the oblasts would deal more meaningfully with questions of ensuring normal operations at farms, this alone would increase the sale of meat to the state by 33,000 tons, and of eggs by 430 million annually.

Serious shortcomings exist in the consumer services sphere. In recent years the retail trade turnover plan has been systematically underfulfilled. One trade enterprise in three is failing to meet targets, while in Bukhara, Kashka-Darya, and Tashkent oblasts the figure is one in two.

There are numerous instances of individual stores having excess goods while other experience shortages. Intolerable phenomena whereby the necessary range of everyday goods is unavailable are the result of nothing other than inactiveness on the part of some trade workers. Last year checks showed that there were stoppages in trade for 10 to 30 designated items occurring in more than 5,000 stores. These figures are particularly high in Surkhan-Darya, Fergana, and Khorezm oblasts.

Because of miscalculations and errors in studying consumer demand, above-normative remainders of goods in trade reached R580 million, including unmarketable goods and old stock, which made up more than half of this figure. The trade network is not always correctly located. Even in Tashkent city, major residential developments such as Yunusabad, Karakamysh, Karasu, and others have an insufficient number of food stores, industrial goods stores, and public catering enterprises. In Uzbekbrlyashu [expansion unknown] insufficient attention is being paid to developing the trade network in small rural populated points and on remote pastures and in mountainous regions. Cooperative trade in fruit and vegetables is being developed slowly in the cities.

This has all come about primarily because minister M.Kh. Khasanov and the chairman of the Uzbekbylyashu Board, A.M. Makhmudov, have become accustomed to chronic underfulfillment of plans and are showing inertia in eliminating the serious omissions in their work. It is high time that these comrades really tackled this matter and immediately corrected the state of affairs on the sections entrusted to them.

The everyday services are not ensuring complete fulfillment of the tasks set for them. In terms of per capita consumer services offered the republic occupies the penultimate place in the union.

Only 500 types of services are being offered in Uzbekistan, while in other republics the figure is 700 or 800. The production capacities that have been created in this sector are being underutilized. The equipment available at many everyday services enterprises remains at a low level, as do standards and the quality of services.

The minister for consumer services, V.P. Kuksenko, and the collegium members are not self-critical when assessing the state of affairs that exists and they are resolving problems of development in the sector poorly.

It must be said that questions of trade and everyday consumer services must also be dealt with more persistently by First Deputy Chairman of the Uzbek SSR Council of Ministers V.K. Mikhaylov.

With each passing year the municipal services are expanded and become more complex. One acute problem is providing potable water for the public. The situation is particularly complex in rural localities.

Up to now no proper order has been brought to storage of potable water. Because of the unsatisfactory state of the water-supply networks and plumbing facilities inside houses; the wastage of water for hosing down courtyards and watering green areas in the cities of Samarkand, Andizhan, Dzhizak, and Karshi; in the summer months losses reach 40 percent. At the same time, hundreds of thousands of rubles are "leaking away" with the water.

In public health not all leaders have understood t need to sharply improve the quality of medical services available to the public The work of many hospitals and polyclinics is not in line with today's requirements.

Through the fault of the construction organizations and the ispolkoms of the local soviets, and because of lack of exactingness on the part of the Uzbek SSR Ministry of Health, during the last 5-year plan R48 million of capital investments remained unused. And at the same time, 40 percent of medical establishments, particularly in rural locations, have inadequate premises.

A number of major industrial enterprises, such as the Andizhan Cotton Combine, the Malika Production Association and others, each employing 5,000 to 10,000 workers, have no medical and sanitation units.

Radical improvement is essential in medical services for women and children. Targets for increasing the capacities of infant feeding centers are not being met and the construction of obstetric facilities and children's medical establishments is proceeding only slowly. The Ministry of Health and its organs at the local level have not achieved any substantial results in dealing with the incidence of infectious diseases, particularly viral hepatitis.

Deputy Chairman of the Uzbek SSR Council of Ministers S.U. Sultanova must adopt a more principled and exacting position in questions of radically improving the quality of public medical services.

Many unresolved tasks connected with improving standards and quality in consumer services exist in the work of enterprises, in transportation, in communications, and in the organs of people's education and cultural establishments.

These and other shortcomings in fulfilling the tasks of the 5-year plan, and the considerable lagging in economic and cultural building in the republic are largely the result of the grossest violations of planning and financial discipline and often of the norms of socialist legality on the part of a considerable proportion of leading cadres. Enormous harm was done to the development of cotton growing and the entire national economy in the republic by the fact that because of lack of control and connivance there were massive write-ups, giving rise to embezzlement and bribery, primarily within the system of the now defunct Ministry of Cotton Cleaning Industry.

In a number of ministries and administrations the shameful practice of plan amendments downward and distortions of accountability in order to create an apparent prosperity is widespread. The basic principles of cost accounting have been violated and fulfillment of set tasks has been achieved only at the cost of major unjustified expenditures. During the 5-year plan, in industry and construction overrun costs for output prime costs ran to more than R600 million while in agriculture this figure was in excess of R2.7 billion; and more than R1.5 billion of profit failed to materialize. The economic balance is such that the republic's national economy derived considerably less return than was required but everything needed was provided by the state in accordance with the plan.

The Uzbek SSR Gosplan (K.A. Akhmedov) has failed to take all necessary steps to ensure quality and timely work on and strict control over the fulfillment of state plans for economic and social development and has not made provision for consistent and persistent resolution of a number of major national economic problems.

Coordination of the activities of ministries and administrations and the ispolkoms of local soviets is weak in the field of improving planning and substantiating and balancing current and long-term plans and opening up the bottlenecks in the republic's national economy. Gosplan departments have been overlooking very important problems such as bringing reserves for further economic growth into play and improving efficiency in social production on the basis of the most rapid introduction of the achievements of scientific and technical progress.

The activity of the Uzbek SSR Gossnab (T.Ya. Sharipov) does not fully meet the demands of the growing tasks in developing the republic's economy. Serious blunders and omissions are being permitted in the realization of funds for material and technical resources. Work is weak on resolving questions of improving efficiency in the use of raw and other materials and of expanding rational economic links between suppliers and clients, especially on the basis of long-term agreements. As a result of lack of control on the part of Gossnab, major cases of embezzlement were permitted in the Fergana Administration for Material-Technical Supply and the Fergana Oblispolkom Main Administration for Capital Construction.

The Uzbek SSR Ministry of Finance (I.A. Karimov); the Uzbek Gosbank (Sh.Ya. Yakubov); and the Uzbek Stroybank (T.S. Azimov) are not making full use of the rights afforded them in exercising control and preventing and cutting short violations of financial discipline, mismanagement, and waste in the use of state funds.

The Uzbek SSR Central Statistical Administration has not shown the proper sense of principle in dealing with write-ups and distortions of accountability. M.K. Sadykov and his deputies do little to analyze plan fulfillment and study trends in the development of the national economy.

The ispolkoms of the soviets of workers' deputies are not making full use of the rights afforded them in leadership in economic building and social development. They are failing to investigate in depth the activity of the labor collectives and are not engaged actively enough in resolving production questions and creating the necessary conditions for the population's labor, leisure, and everyday life.

To sum up what has been said, it must be stressed that the shortcomings have still not been overcome. Much work lies ahead, together with a persistent and uncompromising struggle against the previously formed and deeply entrenched and unsuitable style of management, in order to create a reliable basis for the successful resolution of the crucial tasks facing the republic.

II. Main Tasks for the Economic and Social Development of the Uzbek SSR for 1986-1990 and the Period through the Year 2000

Comrades. In implementing the course outlined by the party for the period through the year 2000, an important place is assigned to the 12th 5-Year Plan. Its main task, as is emphasized in the Basic Guidelines, "is to increase the rates and efficiency in economic development on the basis of accelerated scientific and technical progress, the retooling and reconstruction of production, intensive use of the production potential that has been created, improvements in the management system, and the economic mechanism and on this basis achieving a further upsurge in the well-being of the Soviet people." This program document embodies CPSU Leninist national policy and the party course toward all-around economic and social development in each republic within the country's unified national economic complex.

In this entire chain of tasks facing the republic during the 12th 5-Year Plan, the main link is overcoming the lag that has been permitted in socioeconomic development, eliminating the disproportions that have developed in the sectors of the economy, improving production efficiency on the basis of scientific and technical progress, and increasing the republic's contribution in the all-union division of labor.

The 12th 5-Year Plan is intended to increase national income R24 billion, or 27.3 percent. The volume of industrial output will grow 24 to 27 percent, while average annual growth in gross agricultural output will be 14 to 16 percent. Capital investments will total almost R41 billion. Labor productivity in industry will be raised 18 percent; in construction the figure will be 14 percent; in agriculture, 21 percent. More than 300 major production projects will be commissioned and 410,000 hectares of irrigated land will be brought into use. Major work is planned on irrigating pastureland.

Guided by the decisions of the CPSU Central Committee in the April and October (1985) plenums and the instructions and propositions contained in the reports and speeches of comrade M.S. Gorbachev, we must determine ways and means to guarantee a rapid improvement in economic efficiency as applied to the features prevailing in the republic, oblasts, rayons, associations, enterprises, sections, and even work places. It is important to achieve a profound restructuring in the activity of everyone, from top to bottom, and a full return from each worker no matter where he may be working.

A major step forward must be made in accelerating scientific and technical progress and fundamentally raising the level of production and output quality. Here, the main emphasis will be laid on improving production technology that enables labor productivity to be raised many times over, the use of resources to be improved, and material-intensiveness in output to be reduced.

Major work will be done in the sectors of the chemical industry, first and foremost in accelerating reconstruction and retooling of associations and enterprises. The use of large- tonnage units to produce ammonia, weak nitric acid, and ammonium nitrate will be expanded.

It is intended to implement a set of measures to improve machines for cultivating, harvesting, and processing cotton, and to strengthen the material-technical basis of the processing sectors of the agro-industrial complex. The use of progressive kinds of equipment will be significantly expanded: NC machine tools, robot equipment, and flexible technological systems. At industrial enterprises it is intended to comprehensively mechanize shops and sectors by a factor of 1.5 times more than during the last 5-year plan, and to bring flow-conveyer and automatic lines into operation.

At the same time, however, it is essential to improve the use of the existing machine tool inventory and means of mechanization and automation in production processes. Equipment down time is especially great at the Uzbekhlopkomash Production Association, the Dzhizak Accumulator Plant and the Samarkand Refrigerator Plant.

There will be a steady buildup in the scales on which computer equipment is used. It is intended to commission 300 new computer and control complexes and many personal computers.

Production of output with the state Mark of Quality will double. Unfortunately, defects in quality and a low technical level for output still remain one of the weak spots in the republic's economy. Responding with deeds to the CPSU Central Committee Politburo instructions on questions of radically improving output quality, it is essential at all levels of management and production to draw up and implement practical measures to intensify the struggle for high output quality and to assimilate new kinds of materials, machines, equipment, and consumer goods and improve their qualitative features. As is known, acceleration in scientific and technical progress is bound up in the closest possible way with intensification of the regime of thrift. At the CPSU Central Committee June (1985) Conference, the clear-cut task was set of satisfying 75 to 80 percent of the increased demand from the republic's national economy for fuel, raw materials, and materials through savings. It is essential that the plans of the ministries, administrations, and each labor collective clearly define specific measures to reduce materials intensiveness in output and make savings of electric power, ferrous and nonferrous metals, cement, timber, oils, lubricants, and other materials.

It is necessary to ensure the extensive introduction of the scientific organization of labor; improve work on technical standards; and study and disseminate leading experience in the use of low-waste, continuous and energy-saving technologies.

One urgent task is the active search for and extensive introduction of progressive forms for integrating science and production on the basis of scientific-production associations, engineering and intersector scientific and technical centers, and ad hoc scientific and experimental collectives. And in this a major role must be played by the Uzbek SSR Academy of Sciences. Its presidium must deal more actively with all these questions.

During the 12th 5-Year Plan, industry will develop at high rates. Machine building will be preferentially developed; output is to increase by a factor of 1.5. A start will be made on construction of an agricultural machine plant in Dzhizak city and construction will be completed at the Tashkent Motor Plant, a cable plant in Sovetabad, and a fodder-harvesting machine plant in Urgench. Capacities will be increased at the tractor plant and other machine building enterprises. Accelerated growth rates are envisaged in electronics, the electrotechnical industry, and instrument building.

The generation of electric power in the republic will exceed 60 billion kilowatt-hours, or increase by a factor of 1.3 compared with 1985. Major new capacities will be brought on line at the Novoangren GRES, the Talimardzhan GRES, and the Takhiatash GRES. The recovery of coal and gas will be significantly increased.

The Uzbek Metallurgical Plant must be reconstructed and retooled; this will make it possible to significantly increase steel smelting and the production of rolled metal. Nonferrous metallurgy will be further developed.

Provision has been made for an extensive range of geological survey work and increases in the reserves of nonferrous, rare and noble metals; and for an intensified search for and surveying of new deposits of raw materials. Production of mineral fertilizers will increase one-third; production of sulfuric acid 34 to 36 percent. Work on plant protection means and plastics and synthetic resins will be expanded.

Urgent tasks in the development of the heavy industry and fuel-and-energy complexes will require the republic Council of Ministers and the deputy chairman of the Council of Ministers, V.I. Ogarok, to whom this sector has been entrusted, to deal energetically with finding solutions for them and persistently to achieve their embodiment in practical actions.

In accordance with the Comprehensive Program for the Development of Consumer Goods Production and the Service Sphere for the Years 1986-2000, it is intended to bring the output of nonfoodstuffs up to R7.2 billion by the end of the 5-year plan; this is 1.4 times more than in 1985. Light industry will be developed at high rates. Production of cotton fabrics will increase by a factor of 1.6, knitted underwear by a factor of 3.3, footwear by a factor of 1.5, and chinaware by a factor of 1.9. The output of goods in the range for children will almost double; the output of sporting goods will increase by a factor of 1.5.

It is intended to commission new capacities at the Andizhan Cotton Combine, start construction of a combine in Nukus city, and build branches of the textile combines and footwear and knitted goods factories. Construction of the Bukhara Textile Combine will be completed and reconstruction will take place at the Tashkent and Fergana textile combines, chinaware plants in Tashkent and Samarkand, and at a number of other enterprises.

Furniture production will increase by a factor of 1.6. Here it is essential to start up production of the most up-to-date kinds of articles, making use of the experience of the country's best enterprises.

Local industry will be further developed. Workers in the sector are called upon persistently to increase the use of local raw materials and production waste, and to develop work done at home.

Enterprises in heavy industry, machine building, instrument building and radioelectronics will be enlisted even more actively in producing consumer goods. For this it is essential to develop specialized shops and sections for producing these goods, and to improve the range and enhance the consumer qualities of articles.

Comrades, in the Basic Guidelines great attention is paid to development of the agro-industrial complex and implementation of the Food Program put forward by the party. In agriculture it is necessary to insure dynamic development, improve efficiency in all its sectors, and increase output and improve quality.

In 1990 it is planned to raise cotton-fiber production to between 1.8 million and 1.93 million tons. It will be necessary to procure 5.8 million to 6.0 million tons of raw cotton, including 550,000 tons of the fine-fibered varieties. 70 to 75 percent of this should be machine picked. Great importance will be attached to increasing grain production to between 3.2 million and 3.5 million tons, including 665,000 tons of rice. It is their intention to take major steps in further specialization of farms and to increase production of fruit and vegetables as follows: potatoes up to 400,000 tons, vegetables to 3 million tons, melon crops to 1 million tons, and fruit to 920,000 tons. Grape harvests will increase by a factor of almost 1.5, and by 1990, purchases will amount to 750,000 tons. Special attention must be paid to the replanting of vineyards, which will switch them to table and currant varieties. Silk farming and other branches in the agrarian sector will be developed. Work will be done to amalgamate the sovkhozes.

The accelerated development of livestock farming will be of vital importance. Meat production must be increased by a factor of 1.5, reaching 540,000 to 560,000 tons by the end of the 5-year plan. For this it will be necessary to increase fodder production up to 20 million tons of fodder units. Fish catches will be brought up to 33,000 tons, or an increase of 25 percent. Major tasks must be resolved in developing the processing sectors of the agro-industrial complex. A number of new cotton gins will be built and existing ones reconstructed. Production of canned fruit and vegetables will increase 59 percent, and production of dried fruits by a factor of 1.8. In short time periods it is necessary to reorient a considerable proportion of capacities producing wine and vodka goods, and to increase the output of natural fruit juices and grape juice. Production of vegetable oils, meat, dairy and margarine products, bakery items, confectioners and pasta items will grow. The flour-mill, enriched fodder and microbiological industries will be further developed.

During the 12th 5-Year Plan, R16 billion of capital investments will be allocated for agricultural development. It is essential to achieve a high degree of effectiveness in the use of these assets. In actuality this means that each ruble of capital investment must provide increased output of at least 1.5 times more than during the last 5-year plan.

The yield from irrigated land must be increased. Under conditions from growing shortages of water resources, increasing importance is attached to the rational use of water used for irrigation. Considerable reserves do exist for this. They are well known, and include concrete-lined canals, restructuring of the irrigation systems and, improvements in flooding techniques.

Some years ago the Uzgiprovodkhoz Institute drew up the "Scheme for Reconstruction of Irrigation Systems in the Uzbek SSR," which was approved by the USSR Ministry of Land Reclamation and Water Resources. Unfortunately, the scheme has gone almost nowhere. Up to now the work has not been carried out in a planned, consistent way.

The republic Gosplan, Commission for Questions of the Agro-Industrial Complex, and the Ministry of Land Reclamation and Water Resources must comprehensively review these questions and draw up and implement specific measures to resolve this problem during the 12th 5-Year Plan and for the longer term. We hope that this matter, which is an urgent one for the republic, will find understanding and support in the USSR State Commission for Questions of the Agro-Industrial Complex and the USSR Ministry of Land Reclamation and Water Resources.

Observance of agrotechnical requirements is of fundamental importance for improving efficiency in agricultural production. We must all be most strictly guided by the instruction of Comrade M.S. Gorbachev that in agriculture we need the same kind of technological discipline as, in steel and iron making where the metal will have different properties with the slightest error. To this end, the role and responsibility of agricultural specialists for the all-around improvement of farming standards must be raised to a high level. The most urgent steps should be taken to reduce losses and properly store agricultural produce. The acuteness of this problem can be judged from the following figures. Up to 400,000 tons of fruit and vegetables and potatoes are lost each year in the republic during shipment, storage and marketing. Plans for the construction of storage facilities are not being fulfilled even though only 60 percent of required facilities are available.

The republic Commission for Questions of the Agro-Industrial Complex, the Karakalpak ASSR Council of Ministers, the oblispolkoms and the Tashkent Gorispolkom must determine precisely what can be done specifically to reconstruct enterprises in meat and dairy industries and vegetables bases and create refrigerated storage facilities. The potential of the industrial enterprises and the construction organizations must be used more actively for this purpose.

The crucial tasks facing the republic Commission for Questions of the Agro-Industrial Complex require that first deputy chairman of the Uzbek SSR Council of Ministers I.Kh. Dzhurabekov and his deputy in the Commission for Question of the Agro-Industrial Complex resolve in a more energetic and skillful way questions concerning production intensification, acceleration of scientific and technical progress, and further integration of kolkhoz and sovkhoz production with the processing industry. It is essential to change the obsolete economic mechanism decisively, make extensive use of economic methods, and improve management in the agro-industrial complex.

The radical change in the way investment policy is pursued will be of decisive importance in achieving a qualitative shift in the economy. Capital investments in the republic's national economy will increase 20 percent. During the 12th 5-Year Plan fixed capital worth almost R40 billion, or 1.3 times more, will be commissioned.

The main task for capital construction is to create and accelerate the renewal of fixed capital in the national economy earmarked for developing social production tasks. Another task is to effect a cardinal improvement in the efficiency of construction production. One important lever here will be the improvements in the economic mechanism, the consolidation of construction-and-installation organizations, and reductions in superfluous management elements. The number of projects simultaneously under construction will be cut, and demands made of clients and contractors for the strictest observance of normative periods for construction and commissioning will be intensified. A course toward industrialization and improving the quality of construction will be consistently pursued.

The construction-materials industry will be further developed increasing the production of cement, walling materials, slate, plumbing equipment and linoleum. One immediate task for the Ministry of the Construction Materials Industry is to meet in full the republic's requirements for construction materials. The design organizations are obliged to improve the quality of technical-economic justifications for construction of and design documentation.

I would like to mention another very important matter. The Gosstroy, Tashkent Gorispolkom and the Tashkent Main Administration for Construction must thoroughly investigate the course of work on the reconstruction and construction of Tashkent and impart to it a more clear-cut direction. Much is being built in the city but there is essentially no sound architectural and comprehensive city development.

Much attention will be paid to further development of all kinds of transportation and communications. Construction will continue on the Tashkent metro, lines to the aviation construction workers settlement and to Chorsa will be completed, and work will be started in the direction of the Yunusabad development.

Deputy Chairman of the republic Council of Ministers G.Z. Zakhritdinov must persistently resolve questions concerning the development of all kinds of transportation and monitor operations.

The Basic Guidelines formulate a comprehensive program of social development and raise the material and cultural living standards for the people. Provision is made for a steady increase in the average monthly pay for workers and employees and wages for kolkhoz farmers. Material and moral incentive for workers with high quality and productive labor will be strengthened.

Public consumption funds will be used to increase assistance for families with children, pensions, and to improve working and everyday conditions for women. It is the paramount duty of party, soviet and public organizations to intensify work with labor and war veterans, disabled citizens and the families of dead soldiers.

The problem of more fully satisfying consumer demands for various kinds of services, reducing the time spent working on household chores, and increasing Soviet people's free time has been and remains urgent.

Taking into consideration the population's increased monetary incomes, plans are to increase retail trade turnover 20 percent. It is essential to introduce progressive marketing techniques extensively and create maximum convenience for the purchaser. The structure of people's diets must be improved by increasing sales of meat and dairy products, eggs, fish, vegetables and fruit. By the end of the 5-year plan, workers' requirements for public catering at places of work will be fully satisfied.

It is planned to increase the volume of personal services 57 percent. The network of service stations for privately owned vehicles will be expanded, and services increased for decorating apartments, creating comfort and convenience in domestic life. It will be necessary to significantly increase the user-fee services offered to the public by all ministries, administrations, organizations and enterprises.

Questions of improving housing conditions will be at the center of attention. During the 5-year plan it is intended to build more than 37 million square meters of housing by using improved designs and better planning. Cooperative and individual construction will be developed in every possible way. Almost 500,000 families will be moving to new apartments and houses.

Capital investments will be increased for the development of municipal services. Steps are being taken to accelerate the construction of major water pipelines from the Tuyamuyunskiy reservoir to Nukus and Urgench and plans to construct a water pipeline from Damkhodzha to Bukhara. This will make it possible to improve water supplies for the population of the Karakalpak ASSR and of Khorezm, Bukhara and Navoi oblasts.

The republic Gosplan, Commission for Questions of the Agro-Industrial Complex, Ministry of Housing and Municipal Services, and Ministry of Land Reclamation and Water Resources must urgently carry out a comprehensive review of the entire problem of potable water supplies for the urban and rural populations and put forward appropriate proposals. Taking into account the vital importance of this question for the republic, we are requesting the USSR Council of Ministers to entrust the Gosplan and other all-union organs with providing assistance for the republic in accelerating the construction of water pipelines and sewage systems in the cities and countryside.

Improving medical services is a most important task. During the 5-year plan it will be necessary to commission hospitals with a total of 23,000 beds and polyclinics with a patient throughput capacity of 45,000. It is the duty of public health workers in the republic to improve the quality of medical services for the public to introduce more extensively advanced methods for the diagnosis, prevention and treatment of disease.

Unremitting attention must be paid to questions of care facilities for mothers and infants and to all-around improvements in prophylaxis and reducing the incidence of infectious diseases and to the gradual transition to annual medical checkups for the public. The struggle against drunkenness and alcoholism and to assert a healthy and sober way of life must be waged even more persistently.

Measures are planned to develop physical culture and sport. There will be further expansion of the network of sanitoria and health resorts.

The implementation of measures in connection with the reform of the general education and vocational school has been and remains an important task. For Uzbekistan, implementation of this program is acquiring extraordinarily great importance. Over the 5-year period the number of children of school age will increase 970,000, reaching almost 5 million. New schools will be built with enough room for 900,000 students. Kindergartens will have room for 320,000 children.

It is planned to train 700,000 specialists in the higher and secondary educational establishments. The main task for the republic Ministry of Higher and Secondary Specialized Education is to ensure that the quality of teaching in the VUZ's and tekhnikums is improved.

At the vocational and technical schools unremitting attention will be paid to the training of personnel for the mass occupations. It is necessary to intensify work to train personnel direction in production; during the 5-year plan more than 1.3 million people must undergo this kind of training. However, there are many major enterprises whose managers have not started to deal with this matter in a meaningful way and where training-course combines are not being set up. The State Committee for Labor (M.A. Zaidov), the State Committee for Vocational and Technical Education (P.K. Kayumov), the sector ministries and administrations, and the associations and enterprises must review and resolve these questions of great national importance.

A complex of environmental protection measures must be implemented. During the 12th 5-Year Plan more than R500 million will be allocated for this and for the rational use of natural resources.

Comrade delegates. Today, from the congress tribune it must be stated frankly and in a party-minded way that the Council of Ministers and its Presidium have failed to show the necessary sense of principle and exactingness in dealing with the economic and political tasks facing the republic. They have been insufficiently energetic in seeking out ways for the efficient use of scientific and technical and production potential and have not assumed firm stances in the struggle against negative phenomena and adverse trends in economic life and against violations of state and executive discipline.

In the accountability report of the Uzbek Communist Party Central Committee to the congress and in the speeches of delegates, just criticism has been directed at the soviet and economic organs. We understand quite clearly that the style and methods of work in the republic government and its apparatus are not fully in line with the growing requirements. When speaking of these shortcomings it must be said that the chairman of the Council of Ministers has still not achieved purposeful work by the Presidium, the deputy chairmen, ministers, the chairmen of the state committees, and the leaders of administrations in resolving the fundamental problems of developing the republic's economy.

Under the conditions outlined by the party for the country's accelerated socioeconomic development, problems of radical improvements in management of the national economic complex are moved to the forefront. The government must work energetically on questions of improving balance and comprehensively developing all sectors of the economy; and must do a great deal to improve the structure of management, planning, and economic management methods.

We face the task of significantly improving financial management in all sectors. We must be more strict than heretofore, review questions of observance of state and planning discipline, and instill in people a thrifty attitude toward the national weal being literally at every work place.

It is now especially important that the work done in upper management levels to increase responsibility for improvements in the economy be extended as quickly as possible to cover the primary production collectives.

In light of the well-known Leninist principle that "politics is the concentrated expression of economics," our activity must be evaluated positively only if it achieves good results in all parts of the national economy. It is essential to make more effective use of economic levers that provide incentive for highly productive labor and activate the human factor -- the creative approach to matters and awareness by every member of the collective of his personal responsibility for the fulfillment of plans and socialist pledges.

Comrades. The broad discussion in the labor collectives of the Basic Guidelines has been a graphic demonstration of the real support from the republic's workers for the new party course and the large-scale tasks put forth by the party for the years ahead. It also reflects the close solidarity of all Soviet people around the CPSU Central Committee and its Politburo.

The workers of Soviet Uzbekistan, unanimously approving the precongress party documents, will apply all their knowledge, strength and experience to fulfill the majestic tasks of building communism.

USMANKHODZHAYEV CLOSING SPEECH AT UZBEK CONGRESS

WA051304 Tashkent PRAVDA VOSTOKA in Russian 2 Feb 86 pp 1-2

[Unattributed report: "Concluding Remarks from Uzbek Communist Party Central Committee First Secretary I.B. Usmankhodzhayev"; at 21st Uzbek Communist Party Congress in Tashkent]

[Text] Comrades: Our congress has demonstrated with renewed force that the communists and all workers of Uzbekistan warmly and unanimously support the domestic and foreign policy of the Leninist party and the innovative decisions of the CPSU Central Committee April and October (1985) plenums and the course toward accelerating the country's socioeconomic development.

I would like to note that it has not been happenstance that in their speeches the congress delegates pointed to the need to handle things better; see and assess situations more realistically; and eradicate shortcomings, errors, and omissions in work more quickly. In fact, when summing up the results of our important and frank discussions at the congress, time and time again we come to the conclusion that we now have an urgent need to decisively restructure the style, forms, and methods of party work and eradicate eulogizing, complacency, and ostentation. We shall be able to advance only when we evaluate our activity objectively and always pursue the truth, regardless of what it may be. This Leninist behest should become the norm of our life.

It is of fundamental importance that, expressing the will of the republic's 640,000 communists, the congress delegates approved the program, precongress documents of the party supported the work done by the Uzbek Communist Party Central Committee to enhance the combativeness of the republic party organization, strengthen discipline and order, and improve the moral-psychological atmosphere in all spheres of our life.

Delegates have stressed that in all our affairs we constantly sense the paternal attention and concern of the CPSU Central Committee for undeviating implementation of Leninist national policy and the development of the republic's economy and culture. This attention serves as the guarantee for our successful advance.

The congress delegates have discussed the faulty style of work by former Central Committee First Secretary Sh. Rashidov and the serious errors permitted in the past in the management of the national economy. Faults have also been noted in the negative phenomena and violations of the statutory norms of intraparty life; collegiality in leadership; and Leninist principles in the selection, placement, and training of cadres.

At the same time a severe assessment was made of those who are today trying to cover up their own failure, lack of activity, and lack of initiative. This was discussed sharply and in a principled manner at the accountability-and-election meetings and conferences and at our congress, and on the whole they were distinguished by their critical substance and a businesslike approach to the resolution of outstanding tasks.

At the same time, in the interests of fairness it must be acknowledged that the accountability-and-election campaign showed that constructive criticism of existing shortcomings did not sound out everywhere, and that not everyone is worried about our common cause. In some places, some people indulged in criticism for the sake of criticism rather than for the successful resolution of the complex tasks that have been set. Now we are one in saying that what we need is not eloquent discussion but concreteness in work and a sense of vital involvement in everything for which our party stands and our country lives.

It was correct to speak out at the congress about today's shortcomings, miscalculations, and unutilized reserves and opportunities. There was impartial and sometimes sharp, but at the same time objective, criticism directed at myself and at the Central Committee Bureau, the Central Committee departments, the Uzbek SSR Supreme Soviet and Council of Ministers, and the leaders of other republic organs.

In this kind of exacting approach we see a true sign of the health and strength of the republic party organization and of its determination to work and act in a new way, in a modern way, and to promote the further consolidation of Leninist norms in intraparty life.

The new composition of the Central Committee, and first and foremost of the Bureau and Secretariat must study and generalize in a most attentive way all the proposals and comments made by those participating in the congress and place them under constant control; and it must draw up specific measures and achieve their implementation.

The congress delegates stressed enhancing the personal responsibility of each of us for the efficient use of the production of scientific and technical potential created in the republic, and for improving labor productivity and work quality. We must report this to every party organization, each labor collective, and each worker. We must not only pass on the atmosphere of the congress but also through our personal and active participation in production and public life become examples of the creative attitude toward issues. Each of us is obliged to show maximum initiative and maximum principledness and a profound understanding of our own party duty, which is to implement undeviatingly the party political line and struggle uncompromisingly against negative phenomena.

We have embarked on fulfillment of the 12th 5-Year Plan tasks. We have done a certain amount of work ahead of schedule. Over the last month the volume of industrial output increased 6.5 percent while labor productivity grew 4.2 percent. Above-plan output worth R14 million has been produced.

A number of labor collectives and the cities of Zarafshan, Yangiyul, and Namangan Oblast have been named as winners in all-union socialist competition and have been awarded challenge red banners of the CPSU Central Committee, USSR Council of Ministers, AUCCTU and Komsomol Central Committee. The task is to make the experience of the front-runners available to all, and right from the start move energetically, work in a stepped-up way, and insure smooth rhythm and growing production rates.

Unfortunately, not everyone is coping with the tasks that have been set. Now especially we must not tolerate violations of planning and labor discipline, interruptions of contractual deliveries or poor quality and lack of rhythm in work.

We must also resolve complex tasks in capital construction. Meanwhile, the January results show that the rates adopted by construction workers at the beginning of the year still leave much to be desired.

We are counting the days to start the spring field work. The fate of the cotton harvest and the harvests of other agricultural crops largely depends on the timeliness of this work. Questions connected with the course of preparations for the upcoming spring field work were discussed at a regular session of the CPSU Central Committee Politburo. The most crucial time for livestock farmers is now upon us. Compared with last year, during the present overwintering somewhat more meat, milk and eggs have been produced and sold to the state. At the same time, the rates of production and procurement are not in line with requirements.

One particular element that must be dealt with in order to resolve the tasks facing the agro-industrial complex is the rational organization of production and workers' labor, and the introduction of intensive technologies and advanced work experience.

The strengthening of party influence on all sections of economic and cultural building, enhancing the creative activity and vanguard role of communists, and improving the style and methods of party leadership are all matters that should be at the center of attention in the Uzbek Communist Party Central Committee, the party obkoms, gorkoms and raykoms, and primary party organizations.

It was correctly emphasized at the congress that improving the communist convictions of the workers is a decisive prerequisite for our advance. Not one communist, not one collective leader can stand aside from the problems of spiritual life, ideological-political work, ethical and intellectual indoctrination, or the development of culture.

Ahead lie grandiose, difficult, and crucial matters. Will we succeed in coping with them? The 21st Uzbek Communist Party Congress has stated directly and clearly: We shall. We must. This demands from the party obkoms, gorkoms and raykoms, the primary party organizations, the leaders of ministries and administrations and all labor collective and from every worker in the republic stepped-up work and tremendous esprit de corps, awareness and discipline. To move forward means to introduce intensive methods in management and instill a new kind of economic thinking, thrift and zeal and a communist attitude toward labor.

Finally, it is very important not to weaken for one moment our efforts in the struggle against those who are sluggish, alien and old-fashioned, against those who hold back our advance. We must bring to its logical conclusion the struggle against negative attitudes that we have initiated and that is supported actively by all workers in the republic. However, for this we must back up our words and deeds with concrete matters. The times demand from us greater boldness, principled exactingness, and the readiness to assume responsibility for ourselves. Herein lies our guarantee of success.

Dear comrades. The Soviet people are living through a remarkable period. Our party is moving toward its 27th congress, which will open up new horizons for the country and impart a powerful impulse to all our affairs.

The prospects opening up for our republic, as for the entire country, and the party's plans gladden and inspire everybody. The program outlined by the CPSU is aimed at further raising the people's standard of living and creating an upsurge in the economy and culture. Making it a reality depends on us and on you, on our energy, initiative, and persistence.

"In resolving our tasks," M.S. Gorbachev stresses, "we shall rely on the working class, the kolkhoz peasantry and the people's intelligentsia. This is the main prerequisite for, and guarantee of, success in accelerating the country's socioeconomic development."

Permit me on your behalf to assure the CPSU Leninist Central Committee and its Politburo that communists and all workers in the republic will multiply their efforts on all sections of the building of communism, greet the 27th CPSU Congress in a worthy manner, and make a substantial contribution in strengthening the might of our motherland.

SLYUNKOV CLOSING SPEECH AT BELORUSSIAN CONGRESS

WA211127 Minsk SOVETSKAYA BELORUSSIYA in Russian 31 Jan 86 p 5

["Concluding Speech by Comrade N.N. Slyunkov on the Report of the Belorussian Communist Party Central Committee to the 30th Congress of the Belorussian Communist Party and on the Draft Versions of the New Edition of the CPSU Program and Amendments to the CPSU Statutes"]

[Text] Comrades! In summing up the results of the discussion that has just ended, I would like to mention the chief peculiarities of discussing the report of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Belorussia and the party's precongress documents. Those peculiarities are, first of all, the complete analysis of the activity of the republic's party organization in fulfilling the decisions of the 26th CPSU Congress, the critical interpretation of the path we have traveled, demandingness and adherence to firm principles, and the search for new forms and methods of providing party and political support to the tasks that have been advanced by the party at the present-day stage of communist construction.

The delegates who spoke supplemented and developed the principles stated in the report, adding new ideas and enriching its conclusions with collective experience. They expressed critical comments and made constructive proposals for improving the work of the Belorussian Communist Party Central Committee, the Belorussian SSR Council of Ministers, the ministries and departments, and the local party and Soviet agencies. The Belorussian Communist Party Central Committee, the government, Gosplan, and the republic's ministries and departments will examine carefully all the comments and recommendations. The appropriate decisions will be made with regard to each of them.

The discussion of the report of the Belorussian Communist Party Central Committee and the draft versions of the new edition of the CPSU Program and the amendments to the CPSU Statutes indicated that the republic's party organization sees clearly the paths for resolving the strategic task of accelerating our country's social and economic development. We are also well aware that we shall have to double or triple our efforts.

The party, Soviet, and economic agencies, the social organizations, and all our cadres must reorganize more quickly. It is necessary to assure that all our work is more meaningful, is executed from a systems point of view, is purposeful, and has a high rate of results.

It is necessary to take an innovator's approach to the resolution of the problems that are arising, and to show even greater persistence and consistency in carrying out the course taken by the party, which is aimed at the complete confirmation of organizational spirit, discipline, and order, and the increasing of responsibility for the job that has been assigned.

Today each of us must demonstrate decisiveness and boldness in overcoming obsolete habits and stereotypes, in eliminating everything that is hindering our forward movement.

Today it is necessary to have a true breakthrough along the entire front in our work: in thought processes, in psychology, in style of organizing and political-indoctrinational activity, in one's attitude toward the job at hand and toward one's social duty.

Today each of us must strain as hard as possible in our efforts, must work with the greatest application, in a creative, initiatory, and purposeful manner.

Only this will enable us to cope successfully with the tasks confronting the republic's party organization and all the workers of Belorussia in the 12th 5-Year Plan. Industry, agriculture, and capital construction -- we must bring these and all spheres of the economy to new and higher goals.

It is our duty to do everything to assure that our republic's contribution to the reinforcement of our Motherland's economic and defensive might becomes both more important and multiples with every passing year.

I shall probably be expressing the unanimous opinion of all the delegates to this congress if I say that the Communist Party members and all the workers of our republic will do everything to assure that the stupendous concepts of our party, the highest goal of which is the welfare and happiness of Soviet citizens, will be completely implemented.

We shall do everything to assure that the forthcoming 27th CPSU Congress is marked with new labor achievements.

VAYNO REMARKS AT ESTONIAN CONGRESS CONCLUSION

WA211044 Tallin SOVETSKAYA ESTONIYA in Russian 2 Feb 86 p 1

[ETA report: "Speech by First Secretary of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Estonia, Comrade K.G. Vayno, at the Conclusion of the 19th Estonian Communist Party Congress"]

[Text] At the beginning of his speech Comrade K.G. Vayno reported on the results of the first plenum of the Central Committee that had been elected by the 19th Congress of the Communist Party of Estonia. In the name of the members of the Estonian Communist Party Central Committee, the candidate members of the Central Committee, and the members of the Communist Party of Estonia Auditing Commission, Comrade Vayno expressed his gratitude for the high trust that had been shown to him. That trust, he said, was perceived first of all as a tremendous responsibility to the republic's party organization, as a mandate to the congress to work even better, even more boldly and effectively, to resolve the problems that arise, and to work persistently and purposefully to implement the things that had been planned by the congress.

Our 19th congress is ending its work. I think that I am expressing the general opinion of the delegates if I say that all of us can be satisfied with the rate of its progress and with its results. It was conducted in a businesslike working atmosphere, in the spirit of unity and solidarity. The delegates discussed very important tasks that are confronting the republic's party organization. They discussed them in a well-principled and critical manner. Now we can see more clearly, in a more well-rounded manner all the strong and weak points, the unused capabilities and reserves, and the unresolved questions on which it will be necessary to concentrate our attention.

A large amount of strenuous and painstaking work lies ahead of us. It will require thorough knowledge, a large amount of energy, an innovator's approach to any job to be performed, and high organizational spirit and discipline. I would like to express my assurance that it is the delegates to our party congress who will serve as personal examples in this matter, who will carry over the demanding, critical, businesslike frame of mind that we observed during these congress days into the primary organizations, into the labor collectives, into the living practice in the outlying areas. There is just one criterion for our work: the real improvement of the job at hand. And, as the congress has shown, we have things that we can improve -- in the economy, in ideology, and in organizing activity.

Our party is now in a state of high political upsurge, with a clear conception of acceleration, replete with creative forces and firmly resolved to achieve a new qualitative state in Soviet society as it proceeds forward to its 28th Congress. Today time requires each of us to perform intelligent, initiatory work; to make bold decisions and perform energetic actions; and to assume increased responsibility for everything that we do.

Please allow me to wish all of you, my dear comrades, and, through you, all the Communist Party members in our republic, great success in your work.

In conclusion, please allow me, in your name, to express warm words of gratitude to the architects and construction workers who created this beautiful building for our congress, and also to thank everyone who performed so splendidly in supporting the work of the congress, as well as thanking the performing artists for the beautiful and emotional concert, and all our guests for participating in the work of the congress.

Herewith I declare the 19th Congress of the Communist Party of Estonia to be concluded.

Further Report

WA211045 Tallinn SOVETSKAYA ESTONIYA in Russian 2 Feb 86 p 3

[ETA report: "Concluding Speech by First Secretary of the ECP Central Committee Comrade K.G. Vayno", at the 19th Estonian Communist Party Congress]

[Text] Comrades!

In summing up the results of the discussion of the report by the Central Committee, I would like first of all to note that the discussion was conducted in an acute and self-interested manner, with a businesslike and critical frame of mind.

In the statements that were made, the emphasis was placed basically on the unresolved questions and the search for ways to resolve them. And that is correct. It conforms to the spirit of the time, and to the reorganization currently under way in all spheres of our life. This kind of constructive and businesslike approach, the well-principled, critical, and self-critical evaluation of what was done, shows that Communists correctly understand the tasks that have been advanced by the party for achieving the acceleration of scientific-technical progress and our country's social and economic development. Now it is a matter of fulfilling them completely and in the best manner.

We can see clearly our shortcomings and omissions, and, consequently, we can and must achieve the correction of the shortcomings and the improvement of all our work.

Practically all the delegates who spoke today expressed their opinion and their recommendations with regard to the draft versions of the new edition of the Party Program and the amendments to the CPSU Rules. These very important precongress documents that were brought out by the party for nationwide discussion received the complete and unanimous approval and support of the delegates to the congress.

In the course of the discussion of the report of the Estonian Communist Party Central Committee, the delegates made more than 40 interesting and beneficial proposals and critical comments. The delegates today spoke completely correctly, for example, about the need to strive for the psychological reorganization of the cadres at all levels, to carry on a more decisive and more persistent struggle against irresponsibility, the glossing over of shortcomings, and the prettifying of reality and everything that has been done and is being done. One person, for example, who correctly raised the question today about the prospects for the socioeconomic development of Tallinn was M. Pedak.

This is a very important question and it actually would be beneficial to consider it at the level of the Bureau of the Estonian Communist Party Central Committee and the republic government.

N. Vasyutin, party committee secretary at a house-building combine, was completely correct when he said in his statement that construction workers want to know where and what they will be building in this 5-year plan in Tallinn, and what the combine's work load will be. Actually, the construction workers can and must know their own prospects. This will give them the opportunity to organize their work correctly and use their capabilities more efficiently. It would seem that the Tallinn City Executive Committee must participate in resolving these questions.

M. Kolosova, first secretary of the Valgaskiy Rayon party committee, correctly raised the issue of the need to devote more attention to the rayons for which their location creates difficulties and the need to fulfill the decisions made by the Estonian Communist Party Central Committee and Estonian SSR Council of Ministers.

Another idea that deserves support is the one expressed in the statements made, the idea about conducting republic meetings of secretaries of primary party organizations and party group organizers. As you recall, we have already conducted such meetings. We had a republic meeting of party group organizers in 1979, and a meeting of secretaries of primary party organizations in 1984. According to the responses and reports from the outlying areas, it is obvious that they evoked a large amount of interest among the party activists and were very beneficial. It would seem that we ought to listen attentively to the proposals that were expressed today. Obviously, it would be desirable to conduct republicwide meetings of party group organizers, as well as secretaries of primary party organizations, where it will be possible to sum up some kind of work results and to exchange experience.

We must devote special attention to the work with Komsomol cadres. Today's statement by A. Almanin, first secretary of the Central Committee of the republic's Komsomol, reconfirms this. Of course, this is not just a matter of reporting that only 37 percent of the secretaries of the primary Komsomol organizations in Kalininskiy Rayon in the city of Tallinn are Communists and only 12 of them were elected as members of party committees and party bureaus. Obviously, this situation also exists in other places. The party committees must devote serious attention to this.

I would like to support V. Liyva, leader of a brigade of lathe operators at the Talleks Production Association. Actually, it is necessary to strive for an increase in the coefficient of shift operation at the enterprises, to include that indicator in the conditions for the socialist competition, and to reinforce two-shift and three-shift operation by psychological and material means.

There is certainly no need to return again to all the conclusions, proposals, and comments that were expressed today from the congress rostrum. They will all be attentively studied and analyzed by the new composition of the Estonian Communist Party Central Committee and will be properly implemented.

Herewith, comrades, please allow me to conclude, since the nature and content of the statements, the complete unanimity of the delegates, and their complete understanding of those tasks that must be resolved do not require a prolonged concluding speech.

PRAVDA Publishes 27th CPSU Congress Speeches

Krasnodar Kraykom Leader

PM041540 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 1 Mar 86
Second Edition p 5

["Speech by Comrade I.K. Polozkov (First Secretary of Krasnodar CPSU Kraykom" (PRAVDA headline) delivered at 27 February afternoon session of 27th CPSU Congress]

[Text] Comrade delegates! In our kray, as throughout the country, party organizations, labor collectives, educational establishments, and each family are attentively reading the congress program documents and watching and listening to Moscow.

The opinion is unanimous: The Political Report presented to the congress gave exhaustive answers to the most acute problems of domestic and international life.

This far-reaching document that is clear to everyone showed with great force the party's ability to profoundly analyze and realistically assess the situation, to draw fundamental lessons from experience, and to resolutely overcome everything outdated and obsolete. This is particularly important at the current crucial stage in the life of our society and in the development of world events. The will, organizational talent, revolutionary boldness, and ability of the CPSU Central Committee Politburo and Secretariat to reflect the interests and needs of social development have been displayed in supreme measure. The vital force of the Leninist provisions on collectiveness of leadership and the enormous importance of organizing principles have been fully revealed.

The Political Report, the new edition of the CPSU Program that we are discussing, and our congress' entire work are imbued with the spirit of renewal of the CPSU Central Committee April (1985) Plenum. The course of boldly revealing shortcomings, conducting an honest and direct conversation with the people about difficulties and the causes of negative phenomena, and resolutely turning to vigorous actions to strengthen discipline, organization, and order has been tried and tested by time and work.

The concept of the country's accelerated socioeconomic development, the practical steps to implement that concept, and the constructive foreign policy based on revolutionary logic and a readiness to resolve international problems — however complex — have met with approval and ardent support from Communists and all Soviet people.

The new edition of the CPSU Program is a great contribution to the development of Marxist-Leninist science. This most important document brilliantly combines scientific theory and party policy with a simple exposition, clear to everyone, of the complex present-day problems and ways of solving them.

The delegation from the Krasnodar Kray party organization unanimously approves and fully supports the propositions and conclusions of the Central Committee's Political Report to the congress, the new edition of the program, and the changes to the CPSU Statutes. (applause)

In preparing for the congress, the kray's party organization saw its task first and foremost as orienting cadres toward a rapid restructuring of their work in the light of the demands of the Central Committee April (1985) Plenum. Executive discipline increased. There was more organization in work. It was possible to overcome the complications that had emerged in industry and to exceed the control targets of the 5-year plan in terms of the main indicators. Fixed capital worth a total of R11.5 billion was commissioned in national economic sectors. Last year's plans for the sale of meat, milk, eggs, and wool to the state were overfulfilled. In 1985 the 3,000 [kilogram] barrier for milk yields per cow and the Food Program target for milk production were broken. Meat production has increased 25 percent since the Central Committee May (1982) Plenum.

The kray party organization is aware of its own potential and failings. Over the 5-year plan as a whole production growth only reached 16 percent in industry and 9.8 percent in agriculture. The desired growth has not been achieved in other sectors either. The state of crop farming is causing particular concern. Over the last three 5-year plans yields and gross harvests of grain and other crops have essentially not increased and output quality has decreased. The kray has great debts to the state in this area.

The measures taken by the party to improve the agro-industrial complex have given us powerful levers for management. It is now a question of using these levers skillfully and effectively. The kray party organization sees its main task as changing attitudes to the land and fostering in all grain farmers a sense of being masters of the land.

Winter crops have been sown in an organized fashion. Almost the entire area sown to grain has been switched to intensive techniques, which should produce not less than an additional 1.5 million metric tons of grain. Intensive techniques are a strict test for cadres. Last year showed that not all cadres have passed it. That is why each field has now been placed under the control of specialists and scientists. Financial autonomy and the team contract are being extensively introduced. We are giving a new life-giving boost to competition for high crop farming standards. A system to provide scientific support for the agro-industrial complex is being organized.

At the same time there is something I would like to say. In order to raise yields and make them stable we must investigate the prevailing structure of the sown area. The kray's scientists and specialists believe that one of the causes hampering yield growth is the violation of winter crop sowing schedules because of late-ripening predecessor crops. This is why up to 700,000 hectares of winter crops are totally or partially lost every year. Partial or complete resowing lowers yields and grain quality.

This is a vicious circle: the higher the yields of sugar beet, grain corn, sunflowers, and many other late-ripening crops, the worse matters are for Kuban's main crop — wheat. Scientists and specialists from the kray's agro-industrial complex are currently working to ensure stable growth in grain yields — needless to say, without reducing production of sugar and vegetable oil — but there is much here that is beyond us. Unfortunately, scientists from the V.I. Lenin All-Union Academy of Agricultural Sciences and from central planning and directive organs, while agreeing that this is an important question, only give us half-hearted support. Yet on this basis the kray could supply the state with considerably greater quantities not only of high-quality grain, but of meat, milk, vegetables, and other products too.

To do this it is necessary to bring the processing sectors up to scratch. They currently have low capacities and are technically backward. Immense amounts of output are lost during processing. More than 1 million metric tons of sugar alone was lost over the 5-year plan. And the more we produce the more we lose. This has happened because for many years proper attention was not paid to developing processing and storage facilities. Construction organizations' capacities were allocated according to whose department was stronger, irrespective of how it was using what had already been built.

The kray will build up production of agricultural output. The kray party conference has set the following tasks for the new 5-year period: raising grain yields to 40 quintals per hectare and increasing gross grain harvests to 9 million metric tons. Higher targets have also been set in stockraising and other sectors.

In Krasnodar Kray it would be correct to predominantly develop the processing sectors, which would make it possible to substantially increase production of food products. In siting productive forces the USSR Gosplan must take regional features more fully into account.

We also have many other unsolved problems. Take power engineering, for instance. There are days when electricity requirements are only three-fourths met. The measures we are taking to beef up savings and make rational use of energy resources are of little help. Supplies to consumers have to be periodically limited and even cut off. Last year alone supplies were cut off in this way on 148 workdays. This causes irrecoverable losses to the national economy and creates turmoil in labor collectives. We ask that the construction of the Krasnodar nuclear power station be included in the Basic Guidelines for Economic and Social Development. This is not just a kray question. It is a problem for the entire North Caucasus. Its acuteness can be lessened in the near future. I do not say this because it is the only problem in the kray, but in order to illustrate the fact that, were the comrades in the ministries more efficient and responsible, it would have been possible to resolve the problems more quickly and incur far less expenditure.

Comrades! The Central Committee's Political Report notes the serious shortcomings that have taken place in the lives of certain CPSU organizations. We regard that criticism as applying to us too.

As is well known, deviations from the Leninist norms of party life were allowed to occur in the kray. People who were politically immature, bereft of class feeling, and prone to servility and window-dressing were sometimes promoted to the leadership. The role of primary party organizations was reduced. Many Communists lost their combative qualities. All this damaged people's education, had a pernicious effect on party organs' prestige, and led to failings in economic development.

The CPSU Central Committee helped the kray party organization. We got rid of workers who had compromised themselves in one way or another. We also replaced those leaders under whom economic affairs seemed to go quite well but an abnormal moral and psychological atmosphere was created. The cadre reserve was expanded and renewed. In promoting workers we make active use of the open selection method with preliminary discussions of candidacies in primary party organizations and labor collectives. All cases of negative phenomena are widely publicized. In short, a certain systematic approach is being introduced into our work with cadres. It has been possible to reach a situation whereby each party committee is now capable of making a principled assessment of any violation of the CPSU Statutes and the moral norms and demands of the law. And people know that.

But the kray party organization still has a great deal to do in order to raise the responsibility of all cadres for their assignments and to ensure that each Communist conducts a resolute struggle against any actions damaging the party and the state. To a certain extent this depends, as Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev stressed in the Political Report, on the level of party committees' work. We are striving to enhance their role as organs of political leadership and to ensure that they are closer to the people, are in more active contact with working people, and are able to lead them. We are paying particular attention to fostering in party workers qualities such as modesty, justice, demandingness, and a respectful attitude toward people.

Unfortunately, today we still cannot say that there has been a decisive breakthrough in this work. Why has the process been delayed? Many party committees continue to undertake a considerable amount of work which is not properly their concern. This happens because the principle of sole responsibility has been relaxed in national economic subunits. Economic leaders are literally surrounded with various instructions. They cannot resolve even the seemingly simplest questions.

And party committees are forced to exercise tutelage over them. Ministry leaders often will not receive local leaders. So the latter go to the party committee and ask the secretaries to phone "upstairs." Only after this will a director be received and something possibly resolved. The secretary has seemingly done something useful. But it is nothing other than usurpation of someone else's functions.

People mostly enter the party apparatus from production. It is they who most often lapse into an economic style. Party training establishments and periodicals do not properly teach cadres party work methods. A great deal is said about what needs to be done but not nearly enough about how to do it. You will agree that this is the most necessary thing of all now. (applause) But economic questions and the ever-mounting flood of paper often leave kraykoms and obkoms no time to tackle their main task — the political education of cadres.

There is also another side to this issue. The Central Committee's Political Report stated very clearly that under socialism there are no rights without duties, and vice versa. For some reason in recent years we have talked and written a great deal about rights and considerably less about citizens' duties.

Of course, conscientious working people continue to work and live honestly. They participate in all our affairs. But loafers, scroungers, drifters, and slipshod workmen without so much as a pang of conscience have started demanding bonuses and travel passes, apartments and cars. But by no means everyone today dares tell them bluntly that they have not earned this. (applause) If a principled leader shows legitimate exactingness toward a violator, complaints — often anonymous — are immediately lodged. Certain newspapers, public organizations, and law enforcement organs, without making in-depth investigations of the matter, often defend such self-seekers. It is clear to everyone that this runs counter to the norms of our morality and the principles of social justice.

That is why the party's demands to strengthen order and discipline in production and daily life, to resolutely end all types of unearned income, and to strictly observe the degree of labor and the degree of consumption are unanimously supported by working people. (apppause)

The CPSU Central Committee is carrying out major measures to improve the economic mechanism. We also ought to consider improving the structure of the party apparatus in order to eradicate manifestations of departmentalism from it. Comrade B.N. Yeltsin has shown this in the example of the work of the CPSU Central Committee apparatus. Examples can be cited from the life of the party kraykom and obkom.

It is no secret that the current small sectorial sections are incapable of raising major questions and often lapse into duplicating the work of sector leaders. Today it is probably here above all that we must seek the causes of the existing shortcomings in cadre work and in verification of execution. This, in Lenin's words, is the essence of party leadership. Clearly, there is sense in giving kraykoms and obkoms the right, within the limitations of established wage funds, to decide for themselves the manning levels of a particular section or party committee. (applause)

Comrades! The start of the 20th century was marked by the entry into the historical arena of the Marxist-Leninist revolutionary party, which led the working people's masses to storm the Old World and enriched mankind with the great gains of October.

The current 27th congress is working out the strategy and tactics of the gigantic creative work at the concluding stage of the 2d millennium, which opens the way to the 21st century.

The Krasnodar Kray party organization, unanimously approving and wholly supporting the political line and practical activity of the CPSU Central Committee, will be in the vanguard of the nationwide struggle to implement the historic plans of our congress. (applause)

Auto Factory Chief Speaks

["Speech by Comrade V.I. Isakov, General Director of the Volga 'Avtovaz' Association for the Production of Passenger Automobiles" (PRAVDA headline) delivered at 27 February afternoon session of the 27th CPSU Congress]

[Text] Comrade delegates! The active, creative participation of millions of Soviet people in the nationwide discussion of the drafts of the new edition of the CPSU Program, the changes to the party Statute, and the Basic Guidelines for the country's economic and social development has graphically confirmed yet again the unshakability and innovative thrust of the party's course and its general line toward building a communist society.

The shift of Leninist boldness toward the resolute acceleration of the country's socioeconomic development, as the CPSU Central Committee April (1985) Plenum determined, is warmly approved and wholly supported by the many thousands-strong collective of the Volga passenger automobile production association.

The realism and vitality of the party's plans and their lofty humanism were displayed with new force in the party Central Committee Political Report to the 27th CPSU Congress. The reports' vivid and persuasive words reach the heart of every Soviet worker. There is no doubt that its important provisions will meet with the full support of all Soviet people.

The many thousands-strong collective of the "Avtovaz" association is working to a single rhythm together with over 300 subcontractors. The labor collectives of the CEMA countries' enterprises are working alongside us, supplying subassemblies within the framework of socialist integration and receiving automobiles from us. We receive electrical equipment from Bulgaria and Hungary and lighting equipment and instruments from Poland, Czechoslovakia, and the GDR. This graphically manifests the strength of the socialist community.

Guided by the party Central Committee instructions on the need for new approaches to the development of the economy and the ensuring of the intensification of production, the collective of our enterprise has elaborated in detail in the shops, sections, and work places control figures projected for the association for the 12th 5-Year Plan and has come out with the initiative to scale loftier heights.

The profound analysis which has been made of the state of affairs has made it possible to single out considerable reserves. As a result it is planned to increase the volume of production of marketable output by R150 million over and above the control targets, including the production of 12,000 automobiles, without additional rolled metal resources, and to increase profit by R30 million. These crucial pledges have been included in the state plan for the 12th 5-Year Plan.

I must report to the congress that the Volga automobile builders, with the government's permission, moved last year to new methods of economic management. The association's rights and independence have been considerably expanded in planning economic activity and developing and introducing new equipment. The principle of the self-financing of capital investments has begun to be employed and long-term economic normatives have been introduced.

We have planned to reduce the time taken to produce new automobile models by a factor of 1.5 and we are clearly aware that the most effective way to resolve this task lies in accelerating the retooling of production. Over 80 percent of capital investments are directed toward these goals. The main emphasis is placed on the updating of equipment, the improvement of the standard of automation and mechanization, including through the develpoment of our own machine tool building.

The operation of the economic levers included in the experiment is having a positive effect on the activity of the association: All planned capacities have been introduced, the preparation of the production of a new front-wheel drive automobile has been completed and its mass output has been organized. It is particularly important to stress that all the capacities which have been introduced have been assimilated without increasing the number of workers. The results of the association's work make it possible to confidently conclude that a firm basis is being created for fulfilling the pledges adopted by the collective for the 12th 5-Year Plan. But a lot of work will have to be done for that.

Under the new working conditions the resolve of the Communists and all workers of the association to implement in the best way the party's demands for improving the quality of the output produced has been manifested particularly forcefully. We must not and cannot tolerate the fact that vehicles which give rise to complaints from consumers sometimes come off our plant's conveyor belt. Under the leadership of the party organization specific measures to eliminate shortcomings are being taken in shops and design bureaus and at work places.

Today no one in the association stands aloof from the solution of this very important national economic problem. Well aware of the full significance of the decisions of the Central Committee April Plenum, the association's collective is working thoroughly to ensure that all output produced meets the customer's highest demands.

I would like to dwell on the difficulties we are experiencing in organizing the production of new automobiles. As a rule many enterprises and ministries are unprepared for the production of new subassemblies and progressive materials. All this leads to delay in assimilating new equipment, the reduction of quality, and sometimes even to the deterioration of technical specifications. This situation has been caused primarily by the fact that the USSR Gosplan and the USSR State Committee for Science and Technology are doing virtually nothing to implement comprehensive planning and the necessary coordination of work to create new equipment and are allowing a lack of coordination in the deadlines and volumes of work to assimilate new materials and subassemblies in subcontracting sectors. This results in the unsatisfactory work of the Ministry of the Chemical Industry's enterprises in the production of plastic and a number of materials which to this day are imported, although the new automobile has already been in mass production for a year.

A similar situation exists at enterprises of the USSR Ministry of the Petroleum Refining and Petrochemical Industry for the assimilation of industrial rubber articles, particularly with regard to ensuring the necessary quality for tires, and at enterprises of the USSR Ministry of the Construction Materials Industry for the delivery of glass and other articles which comply with modern standards, although complete sets of equipment were specially earmarked for all these ministries and the preparation of production was initiated 5 years ago. It is particularly appropriate here to note the idea expressed by Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev in the Central Committee Political Report regarding the unity of word and deed.

The association collective still has a lot to do to resolve the large-scale national economic task of the accelerated development of servicing for the equipment it produces. The commissioning of the Volga truck plant at full capacity has fundamentally altered the population's provision with passenger automobile transport.

Suffice it to say that since 1970 the number of automobiles in private use among the population has increased 850 percent. And there is no doubt that the normal operation of the constantly increasing pool of automobiles requires their good factory servicing, whose organization, as practice has shown, requires no less effort than their production.

In recent years much has been done to satisfy the working people's requirements for services. But this must be assessed as no more than the first steps. This is borne out by the numerous letters from customers and the constant items in the press on this subject.

We are taking persistent steps to considerably increase the stock of automobile units and components and to increase the production of spare parts in short supply. We are creating new technical servicing stations and have begun the construction of plants for the centralized industrial repair of units and the restoration of components. At the same time this important problem, to which the central planning organs should pay special attention today, is being resolved intolerably slowly.

In our view all work on the development of the technical servicing system requires resolute improvement. This way of putting the question is no accident, because the mood of tens of millions of Soviet people depends on how the automibile maintenance service is organized. We cannot agree with the fact that the USSR Gosplan has failed to earmark the requested capital investments for these purposes for the current 5-year plan.

The plant collectives pay special attention to the fulfillment of the set task of expanding by every means the production of consumer goods. The Volga truck plant in cooperation with the Kama truck plant and the Serpukhov motor vehicle plant has been assigned the very crucial task of organizing the production of the "Oka" economical special minicar.

The design for the vehicle has been rapidly worked out and the preparation for production has begun. This automobile will be in demand among the broadest strata of the population. To ensure the start of series production on schedule the USSR Gosplan must accelerate the allocation of equipment.

At the plant party conference, the Communists spoke with particular concern of the need to step up attention toward the solution of social tasks and the construction of housing, children's preschool institutions, and cultural and sports projects. Sharp criticism was levelled at the leaders of construction organizations and economic and party organs which have failed to ensure the comprehensive development and necessary quality of housing.

It is well known that thanks to the constant concern of the party and government a large modern region of the city with a population of over 330,000, which is constantly growing, has essentially been constructed from scratch.

The tasks facing the Volga automobile builders are truly enormous. We must rapidly reach the level of the most advanced automobile building. This is inextricably linked with the further social development of the collective. But the USSR Ministry of Power and Electrification organizations which are carrying out construction in Tolyatti city are constantly lowering the volume of the work performed. In 1985 alone by comparison with 1980 this volume declined by R44 million, which is 20 percent of the 1985 level.

No less alarming a situation is taking shape with regard to retooling and modernizing the Avtovaz. The construction of projects has slowed down yet relevant resolutions have been adopted on all these questions and we cannot understand the position of Comrade Mayorets, USSR minister of power and electrification. We hope he will revise his attitude toward the needs of the Volga automobile builders and the city as a whole and resurrect the good traditions of close cooperation which have been well represented in the past. We would like to request that a territorial construction associaiton be created on the basis of existing organizations of the Ministry of Power and Electrification.

Comrades! I have been instructed to report to the congress delegates that the association's working people had produced above-plan output worth over R5 million, including 1,500 passenger automobiles, by the day our party forum opened. (applause)

This is our practical contribution to the fulfillment of the party's instruction that the main factor predetermining the necessary changes today is to put into operation all reserves for raising production efficiency as rapidly as possible, without delay or hesitation.

The solution of the impressive tasks set by the party requires that every Communist and every Soviet person work conscientiously and honestly for a qualitatively new turn in the country's economies, social, and cultural life. And we truck plant workers will do everything to be in the vanguard of this work. (applause)

Worker From Perm

["Speech by Comrade N.M. Yershova, Tool Setter at the 'Permskiy Mashinostroitelnyy Zavod Imeni F.E. Dzerzhinskiy' Production Association" — PRAVDA headline — (candidate member of the CPSU Central Committee), delivered at the 27 February morning session of the 27th CPSU Congress]

[Text] Comrade deputies! This is the 27th time that our Leninist party has held its supreme forum. Each party congress is an important landmark in the life of the party and our people. The situation has changed and more new tasks have emerged. But one factor remains unchanged — always, at all times, and under all conditions, party congress decisions have been and remain based on concern for working people. That is why our people have always regarded and continue to regard the Leninist party as their very own party. That is why Soviet people pay such tremendous attention to and place such profound confidence in the work of our congress, which rightly occupies a special place in the party's history because it is determining long-term strategy and tactics through to the year 2000.

We were all deeply impressed by the Central Committee Political Report delivered by Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev. It spoke with the utmost directness and frankness both about our achievements and about our shortcomings and unresolved problems and set the tasks for the future with precision and clarity. On our delegation's behalf, I fully support all the report's provisions and express fervent and wholehearted approval for the party Central Committee's Leninist course of accelerating the country's socioeconomic development and resolutely reappraising everything which has not lived up to expectations or which is slowing our development. (applause)

This is the second time that I have had the great honor of representing the working class of Perm, one of our party's oldest organizations, at a congress. At all the decisive moments in history, Perm's Communists have firmly adhered to Leninist positions. We are proud of the fact that Vladimir Ilich Lenin, our party's founder and leader, was elected and mandated to the Fifth (London) Congress by our party organization. We shall always remember and constantly multiply the traditions of our fidelity to the party's Leninist course and from the congress' lofty rostrum firmly state that the Perm Oblast party organization has always been and will remain a loyal combat detachment of our dear Leninist party! (applause)

Like all Soviet people, our oblast's workers, kolkhoz members, and intelligentsia feel each day the beneficial influence on our whole life of the CPSU Central Committee April (1985) Plenum's bold and innovative decisions. I shall be frank: Working people appreciate those decisions; they reflect our innermost thoughts. The party's adopted course of accelerating socioeconomic development is the source of the present labor and political enthusiasm.

Communists spoke about this wholeheartedly at report meetings and conferences addressed by one-half of party members. There was a candid and incisive discussion about our reserves and unresolved questions and about those things which now prevent us from working more productively and living spiritually richer lives.

Of course, we have a report to make to the party congress. My own plant, where I am a tool setter, successfully coped with the 11th 5-Year Plan targets, fulfilling the 5-year plan target in terms of production volume in September last year and in terms of labor productivity in March last year.

For the first time in the final year of a 5-year plan, contract deliveries were met in full and on time.

Great changes also took place in the past 5-year plan in the overall economy of our oblast. Its industrial potential was considerably consolidated. The oblast produces 1 metric ton in 5 of the union's production of mineral fertilizers. One-thrid of the country's newspapers are printed on Perm's paper. During the 11th 5-Year Plan we produced R6.3 billion of output more than in the previous 5-year plan. The entire increase was achieved by improving labor productivity. Tens of thousands of families received new and well-equipped apartments.

However, Communists in the Kama region are well aware that many serious shortcomings and unresolved problems still exist in the oblast's economy.

We often talk today about the role of the human factor in all our actions. But what is the human factor, as I see it? Speaking as an ordinary working person, it means above all the honest and conscientious attitude of every Communist and every worker toward his cause and immediate duties. Indeed, at whichever work place a person finds himself, in the production process he is linked by threads both visible and invisible to tens and hundreds of other workers, and while dependent on some he himself also influences the work of others. And our main reserve is only to be found in the efficient and smooth organization of production and in the high standard and quality of each person's labor.

But the lack of coordination which slows down the production process and demoralizes people is still very much in evidence here. As a rule the reason behind it is a lack of conscientiousness or negligence toward the duties placed on people. Indeed, we must resolutely eradicate from our lives everything which disgraces the lofty title of the communist wherever he is working and keep pure and cherish the lofty title of worker or kolkhoz member. It must be admitted that we have produced quite a few of those people who want the good life without contributing by their labor to the good of society.

And I would like to ask you, Mikhail Sergeyevich, To continue implementing equally persistently and steadfastly the Central Committee April Plenum's line of strengthening discipline, organization, and order in everything. (applause) In that regard the party can count on the working class' firm support. Because discipline and organization are the firm guarantee of the successful implementation of all our plans. (applause)

Comrades! Much attention is now being paid everywhere to collective forms of labor organization. I have been a team leader for a good number of years now and am convinced that a good team is more than just a collective of workers, it is a real working family. As a mother I know that if the children are healthy everything is well in the family. It is the same in a team. If a healthy atmosphere is created in it and if everyone knows his comrades, how they work and live, and can come to their aid in time, then the team will indeed be a collective mentor and people's labor efforts and interest in the high end results of the work of each person and the entire collective will increase many times over. It is gratifying to note that teams of that kind are increasing in the oblast all the time. I believe that this is a very good trend which must be constantly supported by party organizations.

But unfortunately it is also often the case that in some teams labor efforts are based on the pursuit of money. There is another aspect of the question here when the established procedure for the planning of targets based on what has been achieved does not encourage the search for reserves and does not galvanize people to achieve the best end results. The solution, in our opinion, is to switch to the long-term planning of the main technical and economic indicators, including the wages fund, over the 5-year plan period for example, and to switch to autonomous financing.

And here is another question. Three years ago the Law on Labor Collectives and Increasing Their Role in the Management of Enterprises and Institutions was adopted. However, this good and much-needed document is being introduced into the daily lives of labor collectives too slowly and, to be blunt, we are making poor use of it. From conversations that I have had with other congress delegates I can tell that this situation does not apply to Perm Oblast alone.

And I should like the AUCCTU to adopt this document more actively in its work and to finally pay due attention to enhancing labor collectives' role in the management of enterprises and organizations. This will make it possible not only to raise still higher the prestige of our trade unions but also — and this is the main thing — to involve labor collectives themselves more actively in resolving the tasks of the economic and social development of their particular collective and, thus, of all our society.

I believe that it is also necessary to enhance the significance of the collective contract which is concluded annually between the labor collective and the administration of an enterprise. It should be broadly based on the law on labor collectives, reflect more fully the combination of people's interests and the interests of production, and be binding on both sides.

Comrades! Like all Soviet people, we from the Urals know well the price of peace. The bitter pain of war lives on in many families even now, 40 years after our great victory. But we also know how difficult it is to defend peace today, how hard it is to consolidate peace in our troubled times.

We firmly believe that the purposeful international activity of the CPSU Central Committee and the Soviet Government and the program for the complete elimination of nuclear weapons and mankind's liberation from the threat of self-destruction, a program set out in the Central Committee Political Report, will enable the people of the world to enter the 21st century as a century of peace and the peoples' security. To attain that great goal we working people will work even more productively in the current 5-year plan and devote all our efforts to the tireless strengthening of our beloved motherland's economic and defense might! (applause)

Permit me, comrades, to assure you that the Communists, working class, and all working people of Perm Oblast will do their utmost to ensure the honorable fulfillment of those great tasks placed before us by the 27th congress of our dear Leninist party. (applause)

Filatov Addresses Congress

PM041616 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 3 Mar 86 Second Edition p 5-6

["Speech by Comrade A.P. Filatov, First Secretary of Novosibirsk CPSU Obkom" (PRAVDA headline) delivered at the 1 March session of the 27th CPSU Congress]

[Text] Comrades! The party Central Committee Political Report — profound in content, objective in analysis, and bold in setting tasks — which was delivered by Comrade Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, the congress documents which we are to adopt today, and the businesslike, exacting tone of the discussion of work results and prospects attest that our party and country have embarked on a new and extraordinarily crucial stage of their development.

The life of Soviet society is increasingly visibly acquiring the features of dynamism and creative purposefulness. The reflections and thoughts of all Soviet people are finding expression in the Political Report of the CPSU Central Committee and in the Communists' speeches at the congress.

The Communists and all the working people of Novosibirsk Oblast at this time live and breathe as one with the party forum. They wholly support the CPSU Central Committee's political line and its practical activity and also its innovative approach, imbued with a Leninist spirit, to the solution of complex domestic and international problems, and they comprehensively approve the propositions of the party Central Committee's Political Report to the congress. (applause)

The measures being implemented in the country since the CPSU Central Committee April (1985) Plenum have appreciably refreshed the atmosphere in society and have imparted a new thrust to creativity and to the quest for what is new.

There have been positive changes in our oblast too. In the 11th 5-Year Plan, industry workers overfulfilled the targets for product sales and for the growth of labor productivity. The quality of manufactured items improved. Year by year the oblast is building up the output of consumer goods, occupying one of the foremost positions in the region in terms of their production. Siberia's first subway has been commissioned ahead of schedule in the city of Novosibirsk.

It is, however, necessary to admit that the results could have been more significant if the oblast party organization had managed to fully bring about a change in progressive methods of economic activity, to promptly achieve a radical restructuring in the style of work, and to find support among the higher bodies of management and planning. Implementing the demands of the CPSU Central Committee April (1985) Plenum and of the CPSU Central Committee June Conference on questions of accelerating scientific and technical progress, the oblast party organization has focused its attention on the utilization of the major scientific and industrial potential in the oblast.

A program for the development of the oblast's economy for the 12th 5-Year Plan period and for the long term through to the year 2000 has been drawn up: It defines the basic guidelines for intensification not merely within the confines of sectors, but also for intersectorial complexes. This is a document of the collective creativity of many scientists, production workers, and party and soviet workers, and their interested response to the party's contemportary directives. It would appear that this program, approved by an RSFSR Gosplan commission of experts, is not only to become a basis for the work of the oblast's enterprises and establishments, but must also be taken account of to the utmost in the long-term plans of ministries and departments. Precisely here, in the territorial complex, the drawbacks of a narrow departmental approach could have been reduced to a minumum on the basis of a plan which was balanced in terms of interdepartmental approaches. But unfortunately this has not happened.

At the end of last year the scientists of the USSR Academy of Sciences Siberian Department succeeded, as a result of great peristence, in securing an agreement on the inclusion in the state and sectorial plans of about 130 major completed pieces of work which, given widespread introduction, could yield annual savings of hundreds of millions of rubles. But for approximately a similar number of developments the questions of their implementation in the 12th 5-Year Plan period remain for the time being altogether open.

Such instances must make us more persistent in seeking ways to effect the efficient cooperation of central and local organs of management, especially on questions of accelerating scientific and technical progress and of enhancing the role of planning organs. At the same time new and more effective methods of cooperation between science and practical work must be sought and found. And although the oblast party organization has already discovered many organizational forms for improving the machinery of links between science and production which have proved their worth, many problems remain here. Above all, not all scientific collectives and their party organizations are yet operating with the necessary effectiveness nor are they struggling sufficiently persistently for the implementation of their proposals. The design and experimental production base — an important element of the materialization of ideas and for the accelration of the introduction of scientists' developments, all the way through to their mass dissemination — is being built up only slowly.

The experience of many of the country's collectives, and above all of the Ukrainian SSR Academy of Sciences, attests to the high effectiveness of unifying subdivisions which carry out fundamental scientific research, the design analysis of new solutions, and the production of experimental batches of materials, instruments, and machines. Such experience also exists in Novosibirsk.

The utilization in new flowlines at enterprises of the Electrical Equipment Industry of powerful electron accelerators and other unique electrophysical equipment developed and built by the USSR Academy of Sciences Siberian Department Institute of Nuclear Physics has yielded during the years of the 11th 5-Year Plan an economic savings totaling more than R250 million. But this savings would be immeasurably greater if the aforementioned equipment were to be put into series production and used in many sectors. Unfortunately negotiations over many years with the Ministry of the Electrical Equipment Industry concerning the organization of the series production of industrial electron accelerators at its enterprises located in Novosibirsk have so far been fruitless.

Surely the discussion of the imperfection of links between science and production cannot be conducted ad infinitum? After all, because of a lack of vested interest and sometimes because of the indifference of certain economic leaders and passivity on the part of specialists, too much effort has to be spent on "pushing through" technical and technological solutions which have been brought into being and proven in practice.

While increasing the party's demands on the leaders of scientific research institutes and design organizations regarding the fruitfulness of their work, it is, at the same time, our task to nurture a sense of very great responsibility for the utilization of the latest achievements of Soviet science among leaders of all ranks.

The party Central Committee decision on the creation of intersectorial scientific and technical complexes, which was mentioned in the CPSU Central Committee Political Report, is an important step along the path of integrating science and production. One such complex — "Katalizator" — is headed by our USSR Academy of Sciences Siberian Department Institute of Catalysis. As applied to Novosibirsk, this form reveals the opportunity to set up intersectoriasl scientific and technical complexes such as "Radiatsiya," "Mikrofotoelektronika," "Impulsnyye Mashiny," and "Avtomatika," for which the appropriate proposals have already been submitted to the USSR State Committee for Science and Technology, on the basis of the academy institutes and with the inclusion in them of scientific research institutes and design bureaus of the so-called practical applications "zone" ["poyas" vnedreniya] which exists here, and on the basis of certain enterprises.

Speaking of the problems of accelerating scientific and technical progress we, of course, are in no way inclined to minimize our shortcomings and our role in overcoming shortcomings. We fully support the CPSU Central Committee Political Report's propositons that success in the implementation of the programs outlined, and above all the program for scientific and technical progress, will largely depend on the creation of an atmosphere of creativity, demandingness, the improvement of cadre training, and the further enhancement of the standard of living and of the everyday life of our people.

The party Central Committee recently criticized sternly but justly the Novosibirsk party organization for shortcomings and omissions in work on increasing the production of food resources. In the main the blame for the unsatisfactory solution of this important problem lies on our conscience. And although all types of agricultural products produced here are shipped out of the oblast (for instance, 340,000-350,000 metric tons of milk annually), we still have many unutilized reserves and still more shortcomings. The party Central Committee resolution on this issue has now been discussed in all party organizations and the necessary measures have been defined. With the aid of Siberian scientists measures have been devised for the introduction of intensive technologies in the production of grain, feed, and livestock raising products. Enterprises in agriculture and the processing industry are being reconstructed. In a word, the prerequisites are being created for obtaining a good harvest this very year which will make it possible to increase the output of livestock raising products and vegetables. At the same time we are counting on the fact that in the current 5-year plan period the oblast's lag in terms of the renewal of obsolete equipment and also in terms of the work load of equipment will be eliminated.

The practical implementation of the important tasks being discussed today at the congress will undoubtedly depend on our presence of mind, businesslike management, precision of action, and our ability to boldly and energetically resolve social problems. The weakest spot in the oblast is the construction complex. As in other oblasts, the development of our construction organizations is lagging behind.

The new leadership of the USSR Ministry of Construction has taken an understanding attitude toward our problems. But much dogged joint work still lies ahead in order to properly strengthen the construction base.

As can be seen, the success of the solution of many tasks will depend more and more, the further we proceed, upon the nature of the professional cooperation between central and local management organs. In this respect a number of positive trends have been defined just recently, including in our oblast. Important USSR Council of Ministers and RSFSR Council of Ministers resolutions have been adopted, and also joint decisions with certain ministries and departments. This cooperation now needs to be backed up with a real system of energetic practical actions by the apparatuses of the ministries and local organs of management linked with the sensible and objective distribution of responsibility and concern for the state of affairs.

Speaking of the improvement of the style of our work, one ought once again to note as an undesirable phenomenon the increasing number of all manner of commissions from the center and the ever increasing flow of business papers and documents which has already been mentioned here by speakers. Extensive reference material and various documents are prepared for when those carrying out checks are due to arrive, and much time is spend on this.

We have measures against every eventuality, for every decision from a higher-level body we have our own decision, and for every occasion we hold a vast conference, even though at times it may be incoherent. We have all this but frequently the main thing is lacking — live organizational work and real deeds. There is frequently not time for this. We must resolutely and persistently learn to work in a new manner, expand our outlook, study and apply progressive experience, and hone organizational skills.

Maybe the structure of the management apparatus ought to be examined, the consolidation and amalgamation of sectorial sections in party obkoms and kraykoms, and even in the CPSU Central Committee, should be embarked upon, and the further reduction of certain elements [zvenya] in ministries and departments should be carried out.

Social scientists must make a major contribution to the study of questions of management, of the style of work, and of the activation of the human factor. Meanwhile, since the CPSU Central Committee June (1983) Plenum, appreciable changes for the better in the activity of many social science establishments have not been forthcoming. Their recommendations are frequently divorced from life and are of a scholastic nature, as was rightly commented upon in the CPSU Central Committee Political Report. In connection with the new tasks now facing the party and society, the need arises for the efforts of the social sciences to be focused on the main avenues in order that they may indeed be a theortical tool for studying the processes taking place in society. Their organizational integration, above all in major scientific centers, in the context of comprehenmsive programs aimed at the study of problems which are urgent under contemporary conditions could become an important step in enhancing the efficiency of work.

Possibly thought should be given to the creation in the country of a single coordinating center which would direct the activity of numerous scientific subdepartments in the social sciences field toward the in-depth research of topical problems of the present time and the issuing of recommendations for the party's practical workers on the basis of this research.

There are still many shortcomings and omissions in our work. But the party Central Committee and the CPSU Central Committee Politburo are setting a living example of how we must combat these. The broad development of criticism and self-criticism, unity of word and deed, and the enhancement of exactingness toward cadres — this is what will help us to eliminate negative tendencies more rapidly and to restructure all activity in a spirit of great activeness, optimimism, and businesslike efficiency.

Comrade delegates! In a few days our historic 27th party congress will complete its work and we will disperse to implement its decisions locally. The Communists of the Novosibirsk party organization realize the full measure of their responsibility for the fate of the radical transformations in the country and society and for the consolidation of international links with fraternal parties and peoples in the struggle for peace. The Communists and all the working people of Novosibirsk Oblast will do everything possible to be equal to the congress' demands and will make a fitting contribution to the development of the production forces of Siberia and of the country as a whole. (applause)

Kazakh's Nazarbayev

PM051832 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 5 Mar 86
Second Edition pp 4-5

["Speech by Comrade N.A. Nazarbayev, Chairman of the Kazakh SSR Council of Ministers" (PRAVDA headline) delivered at 4 March morning session of 27th CPSU Congress]

[Text] Comrade delegates! The attention of the entire world public is focused on the work of our congress. The Central Committee Political Report delivered by Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev to the 27th CPSU Congress provided a profound description of the modern world and defined strategic tasks for the all-around improvement of socialism, which is a major contribution to the theory and practice of communist building. The concept of socioeconomic acceleration put forward by the CPSU Central Committee April (1985) Plenum and unanimously supported by the party and people has been further developed. The Political Report is a vivid example of frank and principled discussion of the most urgent problems. It takes into account Lenin's behest: Tell the party and the people the truth and nothing but the truth! (applause)

On the basis of the decisions of the Central Committee April Plenum and considering in a realistic and balanced way the results of the path that has been traveled, the party has set a task of exceptional importance — achieving a qualitatively new state of our society. This gives dynamism to social progress and strengthens in people creative initiative and the desire to work with high responsibility and initiative. The atmosphere which, thanks to the efforts of the Central Committee and its Politburo, today prevails in the party and among the people, accords with the aspirations of Communists and each Soviet person. Positive changes are visible in all spheres of life, in the psychology of leading cadres, and in people's common mood for action.

The people of Kazakhstan, together with the entire Soviet people, ardently approve the party's course of innovating, boldly questing, developing scientific and technical progress, and strengthening organization and order, and also wholly support its wide-ranging peace-loving foreign policy initiative. (applause)

The implementation of the party's directives and the draft Basic Guidelines for the USSR's Economic and Social Development in 1986-1990 and for the Period Through the Year 2000 set forth in Comrade N.I. Ryzhkov's report will promote the achievement of the supreme goal of the CPSU'S economic strategy — the steady raising of the people's prosperity.

The fraternal union republics are being comprehensively developed and their contribution to strengthening the country's unified national economic complex is growing. This is yet another vivid reflection of the triumph of the CPSU's Leninist nationalities policy and the indissoluble friendship among the Soviet peoples.

In the 12th 5-Year Plan industrial production in Kazakhstan is planned to increase by 23-26 percent compared with the 19.4 percent achieved in the 11th 5-Year Plan. The Kazakh SSR's importance in the country's fuel and energy balance and in the production of phosphorites and nonferrous and ferrous metals will increase still further. The republic remains a major grain-producing area and stockraising base of the USSR. As is well known, the marketable proportion of the grain we procured was around 60 percent, and Kazakhstan accounts for two-thirds of all-union wheat procurements. Its role in the implementation of the USSR Food Program is growing — it is planned to raise grain production to 30-31 million metric tons by 1990, which is almost 50 percent more than the average annual volume in the 11th 5-Year Plan.

Comrades! Thanks to the constant attention and help of the CPSU Central Committee and the Soviet Government, Kazakhstan took a new step forward in developing its national economy and culture in the last 5 years. Positively assessing what has been achieved, the republic's Communists at their 16th Congress resolutely revealed from the standpoint of the demands of the Central Committee April (1985) Plenum the serious failings and shortcomings in the leadership of the economy and condemned the widespread cases of ostentation, arrogance, mismanagement, embezzlement of public property, the mania for "prestige" construction projects, and violations in the principles of social justice as well as in the selection, placement, and training of cadres. Calling things by their proper names, it must be said that there has been a standstill among workers in high posts on the pretext of stability. This has given rise to a situation of eulogy and subservience, has placed these leaders beyond criticism, and the demand for a careful attitude toward cadres has turned in places into total forgiveness and total license, which has led to violations of party and state discipline. Because of such cases revealed by the CPSU Central Committee last year, the first secretaries of Chimkent and Alma-Ata party obkoms, the chairman of the Tselinograd Oblispolkom, and a number of other leading workers were removed from their posts.

These negative phenomena could not fail to affect the development of the republic's national economy. Over the 5-year period some R2.5 billion in industrial output was underdelivered and returns on funds fell by 15 percent. More than 1 million square meters of housing was not commissioned. The state was supplied with less grain, meat, and milk than planned. It is typical that over the last decade industry has grown on average 2.4 times slower than in the previous 10 years. Justifiable and sharp party criticism was leveled against the republic in the Central Committee Political Report for these and other negative trends in our work. The Kazakh SSR Council of Ministers is to blame for the lag in economic growth rates.

The republic must exactingly analyze the lessons of the past and take practical measures to eradicate the causes of the shortcomings. It must be said that certain of our republic and oblast leaders are so unaccustomed to direct criticism that, after the Kazakh Communist Party Congress, they literally rushed to refute the obvious. And they are confused: Was it necessary to admit shortcomings so frankly? What caused them? Even though the answers to these questions were provided by the CPSU Central Committee April (1985) Plenum and by the entire course of the 27th party congress. (applause)

Comrades! We are only at the start of the path mapped out by the party for galvanizing the human factor and improving discipline; but it is already clear from last year's results that this path is fruitful. Kazakh people are now restructuring their work taking account of the republic's place and role in the all-union division of labor and our responsibility to ensure the contribution to the common cause which the party and country expect of us. Production collectives are striving to ensure that from the very outset of the 5-year plan the rhythm and content of their labor accord with the intensive tasks of the 5-year plan. At the same time not everyone is yet working in the spirit of the demands of the times and stoppages are permitted, which attests to failings in the activity of republic organs and in the labor collectives themselves. But sometimes not everything depends purely on us. Unfortunately, the leaders of certain union ministries and departments, with no heed for the consequences, postpone the resolution of certain major problems for the republic for long periods and operate in the old way.

Today Kazakhstan accounts for 30-70 percent of output in the country of nonferrous metals such as copper, zinc, and lead. But because of the lag in the development of the raw material base this sector has found itself in a difficult position, although there are considerable ore deposits near to existing enterprises.

Moreover, over 30 percent of known reserves of phosphorites in the USSR are concentrated in the south of the republic. On their basis major plants have been constructed which now produce 90 percent of all-union production of yellow phosphorus. Yet the enterprises' capacities are substantially underloaded. One of the main reasons is the shortage of electricity.

Last year the CPSU Central Committee and the USSR Council of Ministers adopted resolutions whose implementation should resolve these problems. The 5-year plan has only just started, but the USSR Gosplan, the USSR Ministry of Nonferrous Metallurgy, and the USSR Ministry of Power and Electrification, not having allocated for 1986 the funds stipulated by the resolutions, are already undermining the fulfillment of directive decisions in the first few months. As a result, the development not only of the aforementioned sectors, which are of all-union importance, but also the implementation of the targets outlined by the draft Basic Guidelines for the USSR's Economic and Social Development in 1986-1990 and for the Period Through the Year 2000 are threatened.

Is it not this approach that has given rise to the double counting, according to annual and 5-yearly plans; that has become established in recent 5-year plans? In certain places it has to all intents and purposes promoted the justification of amendments to plans, has often led to formalism in the organization of socialist competition, and has discouraged cadres. It is mainly because of these reasons that the republic was unable to meet the targets of the 11th 5-Year Plan for electricity generation and oil extraction and refining.

Nikolay Ivanovich Ryzhkov's report poses the very timely question that the time has come to raise the responsibility of planning organs in practice for quality and for ensuring that plans are balanced, and the responsibility of ministries for ensuring the unconditional fulfillment of party and government resolutions. (applause) Then the responsibility of local organs and enterprise leaders for the implementation of production targets will be higher and more concrete.

The problem of the comprehensive processing of the waste and slag produced by the metallurgical and phosphorus industries and thermal power stations can in no way be solved owing to departmental barriers. In Kazakhstan stocks of these products have reached over 5 billion metric tons and continue to grow, becoming a source for increasingly dangerous air and water pollution, land deterioration, and serious disruption of the ecological balance. Yet the utilization of these waste products is a profitable matter. Here, too, a considerable amount is being done in the republic. Thus, an entire R35 million complex at the Leninogorsk combine makes it possible to obtain as much nonferrous metal from waste per year as is produced from the processing of 3 million metric tons of ore. Building a mine of that capacity would cost some R200 million. And the cost of each metric ton of metal produced from waste is 40 percent less. I could go on. The Balkhash mining and metallurgical combine and the Ust-Kamenogorsk lead and zinc combine have introduced fundamentally new and essentially revolutionary techniques for the autogenous welding of copper, lead, and zinc raw materials that make it possible to raise assemblies' productivity many times over, to achieve considerable savings in resources, and to comprehensively utilize mineral raw materials. The widespread assimilation of these advanced techniques is one of the most important avenues of scientific and technical progress.

Bearing in mind the fact that the solution of the problem which we are discussing is of an intersector nature and usually gets bogged down in the infighting between departmental interests, we consider it necessary to create in the country an intersector scientific and technical complex "Secondary Resources and the Comprehensive Utilization of Raw Materials" under the auspices of the USSR State Committee for Science and Technology and the USSR Gossnab.

In his speeches, Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev has repeatedly pointed to the serious shortcomings in gross cost indicators, on the basis of which growth rates are calculated and enterprises' work is assessed. For instance, the Karaganda metallurgical combine, with unused rolled metal capacity, in the last 5-year plan dispatched to other enterprises in the sector almost 1.5 million metric tons of steel billets over thousands of kilometers, spending considerable state funds on freight. Double counting of their cost resulted in an increase in sales volume being recorded for the USSR Ministry of Ferrous Metallurgy, but in fact there had not been an additional gram of rolled metal produced. Unfortunately, such cases are not exceptional.

In this connection I would like to say that planning in rubles on the basis of the level that has been achieved puts the newly appointed economic leaders in a difficult position. And this is why: Their predecessors, creating a picture of prosperity, were not sufficiently painstaking in choosing funds. In order to "crank up" gross output they expanded double counting of materials and semimanufactures and hiked prices; some people did not even balk at overreporting. Now the output volume in rubles produced in this way serves as the base for planning for the further growth in production and labor productivity. This forces economic managers to go further down the path they have traveled. The quest for volume in terms of rubles counteracts the improvement of production efficiency and output quality, particularly of consumer goods. That is why we ardently support the task set in the Central Committee Political Report of "working out effective cost-conscious incentives" in order to ensure that stress is laid not on gross output but on the quantity, range, and quality of goods! (applause)

Comrades! In the current 5-year plan the republic will have to increase meat and milk production by 21-29 and 17-19 percent respectively. However, it should be said that the funds invested in developing stockraising have not produced the proper returns, since extensive factors prevailed. This has led to the loss of the positions that had been gained. If the republic had maintained animal productivity even at the 1980 level the 5-year plan for meat production would have been fulfilled and the plans for milk and wool production would have been overfulfilled. Measures are currently being taken in the republic to improve the state of affairs in stockraising. However, it must be said that the main unresolved problem continues to be the prevailing discrepancy between the feed base and livestock numbers.

Since Kazakhstan is located in a risky area for crop farming the volume of procurement of succulent and coarse feed shows marked fluctuations from year to year. But even if the animals are fully supplied with feed and fed according to progressive techniques, farms still have a protein deficit of 500-600,000 metric tons and for many years livestock units have been receiving less than half of the grain forage that they need, which prevents work being conducted intensively and high weight conditions and milk yields being achieved.

Each oblast and rayon in the republic is now developing the "Protein" program based on boosting yields of grasses and silage crops, increasing pulse crops in the structure of feed cultivation, and expanding the area of irrigated land. The bringing of solonetz into agricultural use is a major reserve for feed production. For us solonetz land is truly a second virgin land. By 1990 we must open up almost 4 million hectares of this land. Yet today the necessary machines and equipment for this do not exist. Furthermore, there is a severe lack of silage harvesting combines and specialized enterprises for the production of deep-well pumps and floating pumping stations. The Ministry of Tractor and Agricultural Machine Building, the Ministry of Machine Building for Animal Husbandry and Feed Production, the USSR Gosplan, and other union organs must vigorously resolve the urgent problems of the countryside.

Comrades! The adoption of the new edition of the CPSU Program, its statutes and amendments, and the ratification of the Basic Guidelines — all documents of immense historic importance — will generate a new upsurge of labor and political activeness among Soviet people.

Everything toward which the Leninist party is orienting us today is imbued with a spirit of innovation and concern for the peaceful and happy future of our great socialist fatherland and each Soviet person. That is why for us Communists there is no higher honor than to be active fighters for high party ideals. (applause)

Ukrainian Academy of Sciences Head

PM051645 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 5 Mar 86 Second Edition pp 6-7

["Speech by Comrade B.Ye. Paton, President of the Ukrainian SSR Academy of Sciences and Director of the Ye.O. Paton Institute of Electric Welding" (PRAVDA headline) delivered at 4 March morning session of 27th CPSU Congress]

[Text] Esteemed comrades! We heard with tremendous attention the CPSU Central Committee Political Report. It analyzed from principled party stances the topical problems of the present stage which represents a turning point, defined the directions for restructuring and the tasks for accelerating our socioeconomic development and precisely formulated the Soviet concept of the peaceful future of mankind.

The congress documents will undoubtedly replenish our party's theoretical arsenal. The acceleration of scientific and technical development and the party's strategy are the key to solving all our problems. This strategy is a recurrent theme in Nikolay Ivanovich Ryzhkov's report.

Fully suppporting the course drawn up by the party, the Ukraine's scientists are seeking to place the tremendous creative potential of science at the service of the national economy.

Proceeding from the principle of the organizational unity of Soviet science, we are cooperating closely with the USSR Academy of Sciences and the academies of sciences of the fraternal union republics and we are concentrating scientific forces and material resources primarily in those main avenues where we can ensure the attainment of leading positions in Soviet and world science.

We have achieved really important fundamental results In certain directions. New efficient technologies for machine building, metallurgy, and other sectors of industry have been devised on the basis of these results.

The Ukrainian SSR Academy of Sciences is paying great attention to the consolidation of links with production and to the development and improvement of their forms. Over the years of the 11th 5-Year Plan, this provided the opportunity to introduce into the national economy 7,500 developments yielding an economic saving of more than R3 billion, to acquire 10,600 inventor's certificates for inventions, and to conclude 95 licensing agreements. (applause)

These indicators are 50-100 percent higher than what was achieved in the previous 5-year plan. But, comrades, we understand full well that, bearing in mind the new tasks, what we have done is patently inadequate.

The implementation of the party's strategic line requires that science should fully manifest itself as a direct production force. The conditions for this exist in our country. Soviet science is an acknowledged leader in many spheres of natural science, technology, and social science. In-depth basic research has always been its forte.

We are obliged to ensure the preferential development of fundamental research in the future too. However, the quest for new knowledge must be more fully combined with concern for its utilization as the party demands today.

I shall dwell on certain questions, which in my view are important and which are connected with the attainment of this goal. Above all it is necessary to considerably intensify the orientation of fundamental research toward the solution of scientific and technical problems of great national economic significance and toward obtaining results in the form of important technologies producing integrated solutions which will ensure the comprehensive modernization of production enterprises and whole sectors of our economy.

Here, unfortunately, by no means everything is proceeding smoothly as yet. It is frequently difficult to overcome intertia and to reorient existing sections, laboratories, or sometimes even whole institutes toward new, important decisive probelms, having renounced traditional and obsolete themes which have been under elaboration for decades. In this connection we must overcome that certain timidity and bring this rich reserve into play. In sum, it is necessary to transfer more rapidly to the intensive, really intensive, development of our science.

The second thing which we must ensure is the breadth of scale of practical applications. Even hundreds and sometimes thousands of developments, when used on an individual basis, create only the illusion of progress. A radical turning point in this matter can be achieved only on the basis of energetic, reciprocal efforts by scientists and production workers and on the basis of unified actions and common decisions on the part of all the sides involved. We realize and admit that science has done by no means everything possible for practical applications on a broad scale. The chief thing that scientists must ensure here is that developments are completed to an adequate level, taking account of the real potential of enterprises for refining these developments and launching them into series production. For this, it is absolutely essential that scientific establishments have a well-developed experimental, design, and production base. Much also depends on the stance of workers in production. What is required on their part is a genuine interest in innovations and the ability and desire to undertake a justified risk and not to shirk responsibility.

We know of many progressive-minded leaders of ministries, departments, and enterprises whose initiative and energy ensures the rapid introduction of highly efficacious technologies, materials, and equipment on a broad scale. But of course today one can no longer rely merely on the high personal qualities of individual workers. There is now an acute need for the creation of a unified organizational-economic mechanism for accelerating scientific and technical progress, the elements of which must be the targeted and prompt backup for priority work, strict financially autonomous relations of the sides, the optimal combination of the leaders' rights and responsibilities, and the interest of all workers in achieving the highest possible technical and economic indicators.

In essence the process of forming such a mechanism has already begun. During his visit to our republic last summer, Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev displayed great interest in the work of the scientific and technical complexes and engineering centers of the Ukranian SSR Academy of Sciences and noted the great potential of new organizational forms. We are proud of the high assessment in the Central Committee Political Report of the initiatives of our republic's party organization in the matter of creating intersectorial scientific and technical complexes and engineering centers and in the matter of resource saving.

The powerful intersectorial scientific and technical complexes created in our country in accordance with the CPSU Central Committee and USSR Council of Ministers resolution in December last year must become an important element of the new structure of management.

We are convinced that in a number of instances they will make it possible within a brief time span to achieve preeminence in the world in important avenues of scientific and technical progress.

To proceed: The success of all our work on the acceleration of scientific and technical progress depends to no small degree on the balanced planning of its priority spheres. In this it is impossible to use as a reference point merely the level that has been achieved. It is essential to take into account the country's long-term needs. Otherwise we will be wittingly planning for laggardness. I shall cite just one example. The Soviet Union now consumes a quantity of steel pipes equal to the quantity consumed by the United States, Japan, the FRG, Britain, France, and Italy combined. In those countries the consumption of steel pipes is steadily declining, and they are used only where they cannot be replace dby nonmetallic pipes, primarily plastics pipes.

Our need for such pipes is enormous. They can and must be used widely in providing gas supplies to populated points, especially in rural localities, and in creating water supply, irrigation, and sprinkling systems. This will make it possible to save a tremendous quantity of metal, because 1 metric ton of plastic pipe replaces 4-5 metric of steel pipe. At the same time they will last for 50 years without any insulation. Meanwhile the plan lays down a fivefold lag in plastics pipe production in 1990 behind the level reached by the United States in 1984. The reason given is the absence of polyethelene and of production capacities. But the same reason remains, unfortunately, even for the year 2000, and in our view this is totally unacceptable.

I must, unfortunately, note that activity for accelerating scientific and technical progress, which by nature is dynamic and rational, is currently hedged about in a number of instances by a tremendous quantity of paperwork, forms, and unnecessary bureaucratic procedures of all kinds. Behind all this the work itself frequently gets lost and real activity gets replaced by the vacuous production of pieces of paper. Lamentable as it may be, even activity on the organization of intersectorial scientific and technical complexes and also engineering centers is not devoid of such shortcomings at this time.

Comrades! The issues touched on earlier are acquiring special urgency because we have already embarked on the implementation of exceptionally complex and crucial tasks of the Comprehensive Program for the Scientific and Technical Progress of the CMEA Countries Through the Year 2000 which was adopted in Moscow at the end of last year. As the CPSU Central Committee Political Report stresses, an important reserve for reaching the forefront of modern technology lies in the broad cooperation of scientific establishments and enterprises of the Soviet Union and fraternal socialist countries. We have been entrusted with scientific leadership of one of the five priority fields in this program, namely, "new materials and techniques for their production and processing," which envisages the creation of unique ceramic, composition, polymer, semiconductor, and new metallic — including amorphous — materials, and industrial techniques for their production and processing. We have plugged into this work two intersectorial scientific and technical complexes, seven engineering centers, and the scientific forces of many institutes of the Ukrainian SSR Academy of Sciences. The tasks here are very, very complex. Once again, above all, a new organizational economic mechanism is necessary for their solution together with the elimination of the aforementioned shortcomings. Without this, bearing in mind the extremely tight schedule — just 15 years — it is difficult to count on substantial success in attaining leading positions in the world in key fields of contemporary scientific and technical progress. In this connection great tasks face the party organizations of our complexes, institutes, and enterprises which must make each worker fully aware of the crucial nature of the work assigned to us and must take an active part in overcoming problems and obstacles that may arise. We must embark without delay on harmonious joint work with comrades from the fraternal countries. After all, as early as during this, the 12th, 5-year plan, specific end results must be achieved in the creation of new techniques and fundamentally new materials, machinery, and mechanisms. The precise and well-coordinated execution of work with colleagues from the fraternal countries is regarded by the Communists of our academy not only as their most important production task, but also as a direct political, party, and international duty.

Finally, comrades, the human factor is of special significance in attaining the set goals. The efforts of party organizations and of scientific and production collectives must be focused on the maximum activation of this factor. The fate of scientific and technical progress largely depends on who takes up, and carries further, the tradition of scientific questing. Therefore, the training of a worthy new scientific generation and the enlistment into science of talented, and I would say fanatical, young people is a task of great state and political significance.

The next influx of young scientists is already studying in schools and VUZes. It is necessary to attentively bring to light those who have an inclination for scientific work, correctly orient them, and carefully train them for professional activity in science. This must without fail be taken into account when improving the system of higher education. At the same time we must show concern for enhancing the prestige of scientific work and resolutely improve the whole range of conditions which ensure that talented young specialists will join our academy institutes. Specific government decisions are essential here and, of course, a sharp improvement in all our work in this field.

Esteemed comrades! The scientists of the Soviet Ukraine, perceiving the party's program goals as their own vital cause, will make a weighty contribution to the development of the economy and culture of our beloved motherland. (applause)

Altay Kraykom's Popov

["Speech by Comrade F.V. Popov (First Secretary of Altay CPSU Kraykom)" (PRAVDA headline) delivered at 4 March morning session of 27th CPSU Congress]

[Text] Comrade delegates! The more you read the Central Committee Political Report to the congress, which was delivered by Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, and the more deeply you ponder its content, the more fully you realize the truly historic significance of the turnaround in the life of the party and the country initiated by the CPSU Central Committee April (1985) Plenum.

The analysis of our motherland's international situation and new initiatives and proposals are widely reflected in the report. The statement by the CPSU Central Committee general secretary of 15 January this year has been supported by all delegates, all representatives and guests of our congress, and all people of good will throughout the world. The international prestige of the Land of the Soviets is greater and mightier than ever. (applause)

We can all see what a beneficial impact is exerted on people's deeds and mood and on the whole sociopolitical atmosphere by the dynamic, purposeful activity of the Central Committee, its Politburo, and its Secretariat aimed at bringing into play all factors accelerating our development, at eradicating all kinds of negative phenomena from Soviet society's life, and at opening up even greater scope for the people's creative initiative.

All this meets with complete support from the Communists and all Soviet people. (applause)

The Basic Guidelines for the Economic and Social Development of the USSR in 1986-1990 and the Period Through the Year 2000 spell out specific plan targets to implement the CPSU's Program goals. The report by Comrade Nikolay Ivanovich Ryzhkov, member of the CPSU Central Committee Politburo and chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers, sums up on the basis of the guidelines of the CPSU Central Committee Political Report the results of what has been done and reveals the negative phenomena that have retarded the country's economic growth.

The validity of the analysis made in the report and the fairness of the assessments that were made can be borne out by the state of affairs in our Altay Kray.

In the past few years the economy of the kray, like that of the whole country, has undergone further development. However, the economic growth rates that were achieved, especially in agriculture, did not accord with what had been planned, and by no means full use was made of the reserves and potential existing in the national economy. Unfortunately, the kray party organization did not make a principled assessment of this, the loud and sometimes ambitious assurances were not backed up by specific action, and exactingness was reduced. All this was bound to affect the formation of cadres, people's sentiments, attitudes to matters, and ultimately the results of economic activity.

After the Central Committee April Plenum the party kraykom and party organizations waged a resolute struggle against manifestations of complacency and the notorious [tendency to cite] "objective factors." I must frankly say that it is not easy to break established habits. Not all leaders have yet deeply grasped the essence of the new demands and new tasks, and all the indications are that there are some who are incapable of changing their methods. We take all this into account in our practical work.

Of course, bread, the fulfillment of the difficult targets of the USSR Food Program, and the development of all sectors of the agro-industrial complex are in the forefront of all our many concerns. The Political Report specially pointed out the exceptional urgency and importance of these problems.

We are deeply perturbed by the fact that for 10 years the gross production of agricultural products, especially grain, has remained at practically the same level in the kray, which accounts for almost two-fifths of the grain and one-third of the meat and milk produced in West Siberia.

During the last 5-year plan the targets for grain sales to the state were only half fulfilled and the plans for sales of livestock, poultry, potatoes, and certain other types of agricultural output were not fulfilled. Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev rightly criticized us for this at the conference in Tselinograd.

Drawing the necessary conclusions from an objective, self-critical analysis of the situation in agriculture and determining ways of solving the exceptionally complex task facing us — attaining stable average annual grain harvests of 7-7.5 million metric tons, increasing production of grain by 50 percent by 1990, of meat by 30 percent, and of milk by 20 percent — we are focusing our efforts primarily on improving the return on each hectare of plowland, imposing order on the land, and eradicating instances of negligence and mismanagement, which are unfortunately still often encountered.

The 6 million metric tons harvested in 1985 was not enough to fulfill the plan for grain sales to the state and supply livestock raising with feed even to the tune of 50 percent.

We must abandon the "firm conviction" that a yield of about 20 quintals per hectare has been obtained only once in Altay's history. Yes, that is so. But apathy about this and the constant mentioning of it do nothing to mobilize cadres, and sometimes actually demoralize them. This fact, the record achievement and experience, must be studied, adopted, and introduced.

We cannot wait another hundred years!

Unless we do this, our mistakes will be pointed out to us, strictly pointed out, quite correctly. We must do this. We have no other choice. This is for us the sharpest turning point, as Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev noted in the Political Report to the congress.

When it comes to the specific directions in our work, these are first of all the all-around optimization of intensive techniques of wheat cultivation. Last year the application of these techniques yielded an additional 500,000 metric tons or so of grain.

I must say that this is clearly not the result that we expected. The point is not only that only half of the mineral fertilizers required by intensive techniques were actually allocated. Not all methods of progressive techniques were followed everywhere, and many farms failed to comply with the elements of the antierosion and moisture-conserving farming systems and did not carry out agrotechnical operations at the optimum times.

We are drawing the necessary conclusions from this and have organized widespread studies for machine operator and specialist cadres. We are planning to expand the area of fallow sown to grain from 500,000 to 700,000 hectares.

In our conditions fallow, the best predecessor crops, and the existence of a sufficient quantity of correctly cultivated, well-tended, well-fertilized replacement [remontnyy] land is a fundamental question, although that is a mere truism.

We believe it is necessary to increase the area of grain crops cultivated via intensive techniques and to supply it with mineral fertilizers according to the established norm.

This will yield a real, weighty return — a substantial increase in the production of high-quality Altay grain.

The problem of mineral fertilizers is not simple. It is also featured in the draft Basic Guidelines, which envisage starting the construction of an Altay nitrogen fertilizers plant during the 12th 5-Year Plan. However, there has long been talk of this plant.

We would ask that the construction of this plant, which is so necessary to the whole region, be expedited and that the potential for further developing the mineral fertilizer industry in Siberia be considered.

The shortage of means of motor transport remains a constraint and leads to serious losses. The experience of last year's harvesting, when we were given considerable assistance in the form of motor vehicles by decision of the CPSU Central Committee, demonstrated that by this means alone it was possible to harvest about 1.5-2 more quintals of grain per hectare. And, most importantly, to gather the entire harvest!

This is an exceptionally important problem for our region. The harvest has to be gathered in 12-15 days at most, since the fall in Siberia scarcely pampers us; but because of the shortage of transportation and other equipment the harvesting drags out over 6-8 weeks.

There are also considerable reserves of intensification in livestock raising. There is the improvement of breeding work and the expansion of herd reproduction. But the most important thing here is to increase the production of good-quality, protein-balanced feed. Protein is now 20 percent short of the requirement. A specific program for resolving this problem is being elaborated in the kray.

The expansion of irrigated farming is of great importance in our conditions for the guaranteed provision of livestock raising with a sufficient quantity of coarse and succulent feed. The party Central Committee is supporting and helping us in this matter. We now have only 150,000 hectares of irrigated land, but by the end of the 5-year plan we must have at least 300,000; and by the year 2000,500,000. The kray party organization is working hard on this.

In order to resolve all these tasks it is not enough to support, we must vigorously implement the propositions of the Central Committee Political Report regarding the need to more resolutely break with the stereotyped thinking oriented toward extensive methods of economic management and more actively equip economic leaders and specialists with modern intensive methods of plant growing and livestock raising and with a deep understanding of the essence of the new techniques, financial autonomy, the team contract, and the ability to work without making losses on a self-financing basis.

In short, it is also important and necessary to teach all this to our whole party, our political aktiv. In order to organize people to resolve qualitatively new tasks, the organizers themselves need to have a good grasp of both the essence of the tasks and the ways of resolving them. Unfortunately, sometimes our cadres have only a "superficial" and "general" knowledge of these things. But it has always been useless to lead in that way, and it is especially so nowadays. All-around constant cadre training, as Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev noted, is the most fundamental question.

The party kraykom, raykoms, and primary party organizations see it as their important, paramount task to create normal conditions for rural working people's labor, daily lives, and leisure and to improve their skill.

The efforts of the new management organs of the agro-industrial complex are directed toward solving the fundamental problems of intensifying agricultural production. Party committees have posted the best qualified and most experienced specialist organizers to work in these organs.

The CPSU Central Committee orients us toward the need for a comprehensive approach toward solving urgent economic and social problems. We are particularly aware of the importance of this approach in the case of the development of Altay's agro-industrial complex. We are seeking to ensure that, at the same time as the production base develops, the infrastructure strengthens and the scale of sociocultural construction expands.

There are also problems here in whose resolution we must work more vigorously with central organs.

The prevailing situation — and this is an objective fact — is that the provision of capital per 100 hectares of agricultural land in the kray, according to Central Statistical Administration figures, is half that for the RSFSR. This is the result of the fact that for decades the planning of capital investments and equipment has been based "on the level that has been reached." This shortsighted approach, as has already been said here, results in serious problems.

Unfortunately, even now relative capital investments in the kray are planned at half the average level for the RSFSR.

The disproportion between the production and processing of agricultural output is increasing in the kray each year. Over 40 percent of it is shipped out unprocessed. Everyone is well aware of the losses that this causes. A solution of these acute problems must not be avoided.

The buildup of capacities for local processing of agricultural raw materials will make it possible to improve the general efficiency of the agro-industrial complex, to preclude losses of raw materials during transportation and storage, to accelerate the socioeconomic development of rayon centers, and to stabilize the rural population.

A major shortcoming in the efficient development of the agro-industrial complex is the weak party influence on the link between science and agricultural production. And something that is equally important is that we deal badly with the development of our own science. The CPSU Central Committee resolution on the Siberian Department of the All-Union V.I. Lenin Academy of Agricultural Sciences quite rightly censured the Altay party kraykom over this.

Siberia's grain growers need high-yield strains of grain crops that ripen early and scientifically substantiated methods for employing progressive techniques and antierosion systems. That is a great reproach to us and the All-Union V.I. Lenin Academy of Agricultural Sciences from the CPSU Central Committee. Not having agricultural science in Altay simply means working in the dark, so to speak.

There is yet another question. The kray party organization is entrusted with considerable responsibility for organizing the fulfillment of the party and government decisions on questions of the development of agricultural machine building. Each year the kray's enterprises produce a great quantity of tractors, plows, motors, and other products totaling R1 billion.

The retooling of agriculture requires the reconstruction of a number of plants. A number of CPSU Central Committee and USSR Council of Ministers resolutions have been adopted in this regard.

Unfortunately, the fulfillment of some of them is lagging behind. The commissioning of a number of capacities is behind schedule and the assimilation of powerful new tractors — both agricultural and logging — is being delayed. Specific measures are not being taken to develop and put in production the fundamentally new T-250 tractor.

This is a great deficiency of ours. We are taking the necessary measures at the local level; but it is necessary for the USSR Ministry of Construction, the Ministry of Tractor and Agricultural Machine Building, and the USSR Ministry of Power and Electrification to deal with these questions more specifically and with greater persistence.

Problems of the specialization of agricultural machine building merit special examination, in our view.

It seems economically expedient and advisable to concentrate the development and production of soil cultivation equipment and attachments for intensive techniques, primarily for Siberia, mostly in Altay's enterprises where the production base exists for this, although it needs to be expanded and, most importantly, there are trained cadres.

One more point: Altay's power industry requires special decisions, without which in some places it is simply difficult to further develop the kray's national economy. In conjunction with the USSR Ministry of Power and Electrification, we have now formulated measures to develop the power industry in the long term. But I must state, and I think the ministry leadership will agree, that there are fewer vigorous measures on their part.

The Central Committee Political Report, the Bolshevik frankness and scientific approach with which the vital problems of our development are set out in it, and the great exactingness and professionalism of our congress all constitute a wonderful school for each of us, for party cadres, and for all Communists. After all, it is no secret that for a while the attention paid to fostering political leadership qualities in cadres was relaxed, a technocratic approach began to prevail over the political approach, and some personnel lost political keenness. The Political Report uses specific examples to show what this led to in practice.

The truthful and reasonable words dictated by concern for peace, the peoples' happiness, and the fate of mankind which have rung out from this rostrum have evoked an ardent response throughout the world. This raises still higher the prestige of our glorious Leninist party and our mighty socialist state. And every Communist and every Soviet person is rightly proud of this.

The kray's Communists and working people, like all Soviet people, ardently and unanimously approving the CPSU's wise Leninist domestic and foreign policy and the Central Committee's political course and practical activity and approving the propositions of the Central Committee Political Report and the program documents of the 27th CPSU Congress, will do everything to implement the glorious and imposing plans outlined by the party. Politburo Approves Work on Congress Decisions

1800 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] At its 13 March session, the CPSU Central Committee Politburo approved the top priority measures on organizing work to fulfill the 27th party congress decisions and studying and explaining its documents. The decision, which has been adopted on this issue, sets forth the task of consolidating in party organizations and in every labor collective the attitudes, party principles, criticism and self-criticism, highly exacting demands on cadres for an entrusted area, and identification and elimination of shortcomings and omissions on time — as set forth by the Congress.

Stress was laid on the importance of every Communist and every Soviet person becoming actively involved in practical work to implement the plans mapped out by the party. It is planned to discuss the results of the 27th CPSU Congress and the tasks ensuing from its decisions at plenums of party committees, aktiv meetings, and in primary party organizations. It is also proposed to discuss these tasks at sessions of soviets of people's deputies, in trade union and Komsomol organizations, and at sittings of the collegiums of ministries and departments.

At the same time, the primary attention of all party, local soviet, and economic bodies should be concentrated on practical implementation of the decisions of the party congress in the specific areas of each branch of the economy, each city or rural area, and each labor collective; on the fulfillment of planned tasks for the current year and the 12th 5-year period as a whole; and on the improvement of organizational and political work and the styles and methods of managing economic and social development and the cause of the communist education of the working people. Party committees and primary party organizations are called upon to ensure broad elucidation of the Political Report of the CPSU Central Committee, the party program and rules, and other congress documents and to convey the spirit and essence of its decisions to every Soviet person.

The materials of the 27th CPSU Congress will be studied in the system of party studies and economic education, in different forms of mass propaganda, and in educational establishments. Elucidation of congress documents should be closely linked with energetic action to accelerate the country's social and economic development, intensify the economy, perfect Soviet democracy, and further strengthen discipline and good order, and with the creation of favorable conditions for highly productive work, bold creative research, and the affirmation of the principles of social justice with the comprehensive consolidation of the moral foundations of Soviet society.

The Politburo places a high value on the speeches made at the congress by representatives of foreign parties and countries and the solidarity they expressed with the political course of the CPSU and Soviet State. The relevant departments have been instructed to continue pursuing a consistent course toward the comprehensive consolidation and development of cooperation with the fraternal socialist countries and to support all forces that back social progress, peace, and the security of peoples.

Having considered the remarks and proposals voiced by delegates to the party congress, the CPSU Central Committee Politburo noted that their speeches showed a high degree of political maturity and an understanding of the necessity for radical changes in all spheres of public life. Delegates' speeches were of an exacting and constructive nature. They were in line with the innovative spirit of the documents discussed at the congress and manifested a genuinely partylike concern for improving matters in the country and eradicating everything that hinders progress. Essentially, not a single sphere of the life of Soviet society remained outside the scope of critical analysis.

Stressing the great political and practical significance of the remarks and proposals of the delegates, the Politburo pointed out that implementing them is an important precondition for overcoming bottlenecks and difficulties existing in the national economy, in strengthening monitoring from below of the work of management organs, and in developing effective resolutions to questions of party, state and economic construction. It is proposed that the USSR Council of Ministers, departments of the CPSU Central Committee, ministries and departments, and the AUCCTU carefully consider the suggestions made by delegates and ensure that everything of value in them is carried through into practice, reflected in plans for socioeconomic development, and utilized to improve management of society's affairs.

The establishment of supervision of the prompt consideration of observations and proposals of delegates to the 27th party congress was made incumbent upon CPSU Central Committee departments.

Measures were considered to further improve managing industries in the country's fuel and energy complex. A decision of the CPSU Central Committee and the USSR Council of Ministers on this question provides for the formation, as a permanently functioning organ, of a USSR Council of Ministers bureau for the fuel and energy complex. Its most important tasks are to increase production of fuel and electrical and geothermal energy by the broad introduction of the achievements of scientific-technical progress, implementation of comprehensive utilization of fuel and power resources, pursuing a unified energy-saving policy, and developing progressive new forms of specialized transportation, as well as the further expansion of cooperation in these spheres with the CEMA member-countries. Within the limits of its authority the bureau will make decisions that will be issued in the form of USSR Council of Ministers directives.

Resolutions of the CPSU Central Committee and of the USSR Council of Ministers were adopted with the aim of accelerating the development of projects on the production of instruments and means of automation for scientific research. They envision the preparation of a nationwide program for developing instruments and means of automation for scientific research in the 1986-1995 period, with special attention given to production of instruments needed for the development of priority areas of science and technology.

Guided by the orientations of the 27th party congress, the CPSU Central Committee and the USSR Council of Ministers approved a resolution on supplementary measures to improve capital construction for the purpose of accelerating scientific and technical progress in the national economy. The resolution maps out a complex of measures connected with ensuring strict observance of normative time limits for the erection of buildings and with enhancing the incentives of construction and assembly organizations and other participants in construction as regards the implementation of works for the technical refitting and reconstruction of existing production units, and in the further development of the economic method of construction.

It was stressed that party and state organs — central and local — must regard the enhancement of the efficiency of capital construction as one of the most important economic and political tasks directed toward accelerating the country's socioeconomic rates of development.

At the CPSU Central Committee Politburo session, measures were approved for considerably accelerating the production, in the current 5-year plan, of new machines, equipment, and instruments provided with electronic devices and microprocessors. Also, certain other decisions were made on the practical realization of the tasks set by the 27th CPSU Congress in the sphere of development of the national economy and domestic and foreign policy.

Massive River Diversion Scheme in North Dropped
AU091506 Paris AFP in English 1206 GMT 9 Mar 86

[By Pierre Lanfranchi]

[Excerpt] Moscow, March 9 (AFP) — Moscow has abandoned a massive scheme, first proposed under Stalin, to divert water from the north to the south of the country, according to the final version of development plans published Sunday. The change in the plan was voted at the Soviet Communist Party's 27th Congress and published Sunday in PRAVDA, the Communist Party newspaper.

The reference in previous party programmes to diverting some rivers which flow into the Arctic Ocean south towards the Volga, and southeast from there to the Kuban River, which flows into the Black Sea, has been dropped. The plan, as it initially was conceived, would have irrigated almost 4.5 million hectares (11.25 million acres) of land in arid Soviet Central Asia, and significantly increased arable lands in the regions of the Don, the Caucasus and some parts of the Ukraine.

Now, PRAVDA refers only in general terms to "furthering the study of problems linked to the regional distribution of hydraulic resources."

Two weeks before the congress opened on February 25, a prominent economic reformer, Abel Aganbegyan, said the 10-billion-ruble (13 billion dollar) plan was not only too costly but shaky on scientific grounds.

The final program appears to show that Mr. Aganbegyan's criticism was taken into account: The extent of irrigation plans for the new five-year plan from 1986 to 1990, was cut from 85,000 to 45,000 hectares (25,250 to 11,250 acres) in the Kirghizia region north of Afghanistan. In the Turkmenistan region north of Iran, for example, it was cut from 160,000 to 100,000 hectares (400,000 to 250,000 acres).

Ethical Issue Examined

LD122044 [Editorial Report] Moscow Television Service in Russian carries a 90-minute program at 1840 GMT on 13 March entitled: "Meeting with Academician D.S. Likhachev", during which Dmitriy Sergeyevich Likhachev, member of the Literature and Language Department and History Department of the USSR Academy of Sciences answers questions posed by a studio audience.

Talking about ethical issues in science, Likhachev says:

"If science occupies such a colossal place in our lives and if it has become so complex, then ethical issues arise. This is a sphere which demands some sort of new, previously unknown, moral norm. The ethics of scientific work, the ethics of the scientist — this is an issue of paramount importance. Academician Leonid Ivanovich Sedov wrote on this subject as far back as 1973 — there is a very good concluding chapter in his book about the ethics of scientists, the ethics of scientific work.

"Now I would like to cite a specific example of the significance of ethics in scientific work, in the organization of scientific work, in the implementation of scientific projects, and so on. The example is as follows: Recently, the Presidium of the Academy of Sciences called a conference on the issues of diverting some of the sources of northern rivers to the south. There must have been some 60-70 people at this conference; the list of those invited was biased. That is the first violition of ethical norms. So, if a conference is being assembled, then the issue must be prepared in a corresponding manner and the conference must also be prepared. After all, the point here is the fate of a multitude of northern settlements, the fate of the Russian north in general.

"No archeologists were invited, no art critics, no historians, no folklore specialists — no representatives of the humanities defending cultural interests were invited to this conference. That is the first violation and it is an ethical violation, it is a violation of ethical norms. Besides, there was no explanation as to why this diversion of rivers is needed anyway. To raise the level of the Caspian? But the Caspian has risen so much these last few years that it should not be raised any more. This rise has been above the optimum level and territories are being flooded on which sanatoriums, etc. have already been built, on the seashore. So, there is no sense at all in raising the Caspian even further and sacrificing the Russian north.

"Subsequently, what was proposed for discussion? The first stage of the diversion of rivers — the first stage. But tell me, please, is it possible to have, in architecture, discussion of the design for the first level of a building and what it will be like? It is something quite impossible to allow the first scheme — and this without a vote — to allow this first stage of diverting some six cubic kilometers of water from the north to the south. At the same time, there was no discussion of what will perish when this happens. So, the town of Totma is flooded and Kargopol is washed away.

"So, you understand that, after all, any such large projects demand some sort of very profound conceptions about how they may be discussed. Can the present population of Russia deal with its monuments and deprive its descendants, the future generations, of these monuments? Is this moral or not? Why does the population of the Russian north — which has lived there since the 12th century and is startling in its qualities, including its moral qualities, work traditions, folk traditions, literary traditions, and so on — have to give up its monuments and its work traditions, to lose its native country in order to divert water to the south?

"So, you see, the issues are colossal and a great number of examples could be cited on the very same issues, when thoughtlessness and — how should it be put — insufficient responsibility on the part of scientists for their actions can lead to catastrophic consequences for whole areas of the country. And if it is true that the third stage of diverting the waters will touch on Pechora, that means the fate of the Momi people — one of the most interesting and cultured people in the Russian north, for whom the Russian people are responsible — will also be decided. Thus, I have approximately outlined the situation which worries me in the extreme, which I consider to be the most important at the moment — issues of scientific morals, scientific ethics. Thank you." (applause)

Writer's Responsibilities to People Delineated

[Editorial: "The Times Dictate"]

[Text] The 27th CPSU Congress ended on 6 March 1986. It adopted decisions of historic significance which determine both the nature and pace of progress for years and decades to come, progress toward a qualitatively new condition of the socialist society.

The strategic course elaborated by the party at its 27th congress is to accelerate the country's socioeconomic development. The party sees acceleration as the key to economic and social, political and ideological, domestic and foreign problems. Acceleration is the renewal of all our life.

The Soviet creative intelligentsia, like all our people, warmly support the congress decisions and there is no doubt that they will make every effort to put them into practice.

The times we are living in are critical times. They imperiously make their tough demands on every Soviet person, wherever he works: on the main conveyor belt of a giant plant or in a modest factory, in the pit or at the furnace, in the sovkhoz grainfields or in the scientific laboratory. It makes these demands on literary and artistic figures also. They are called upon to enrich society with new spiritual assets and create works which truthfully, profoundly, and vividly reveal the meaning of the great creative work of the party and people.

At every stage of its history, multinational Soviet literature has always played an important part in strengthening society's moral health. This role was stressed with particular force by M.S. Gorbachev in the CPSU Central Committee Political Report: "Our literature, while reflecting the birth of a new world, at the same time played an active part in its formation by molding the man for that world — the patriot to his motherland and the true internationalist. In this way it chose its proper place, its role in the whole people's cause. Also, this is the criterion which the people and party use in assessing the work of the writer or artist, which literature and Soviet art themselves use in approaching their own tasks."

Many factors determine the force and significance of works of literature. Perhaps most important among them is the position of the artist, the ideological and social orientation of his talent. In many books by Soviet writers we can clearly see what they are calling for and what they are fighting against. Our literature resolutely rejects the dispassionate, objectivist "recording" of life's phenomena. Clearly defined social criteria of good and evil form the basis of its main lines of research. Literature draws its strength from its indisoluble links with the people's life and finds there the answers to the most burning questions of the time.

Soviet literature has something to be proud of. Many of its works meet the highest and strictest criteria. From the earliest years of October to the present day there extends a firm, fruitful tradition of active service by literature in the interests of the party, the people's interests. Many books reveal with great artistic force the historic meaning of the people's achievements and depict at his full stature their hero — the fighter, the active man who is constantly in the mainstream of life.

While taking legitimate pride in its successes and achievements, our literature cannot rest on its laurels. The times decisively rule out ostentation and ballyhoo, "putting on a show," and engaging in idle verbiage. On the basis of its gains, literature, like our society as a whole, must move further forward and make its contribution to the nationwide cause of accelerating the country's socioeconomic development. As in all spheres of human activity, stagnation is intolerable in artistic creation. That is why, in accordance with Lenin's precepts and in accordance with the exacting spirit of the times, we literary people should all become more keenly attentive toward still unresolved problems and focus our efforts on the eradication of shortcomings which are retarding literature's development and can no longer be tolerated.

In certain works and scientific publications philosophical confusion and a nonclass approach to the analysis of the complex phenomena of life and culture still have a perceptible impact. The CPSU Central Committee Political Report says that attempts are not infrequently made, in the guise of national originality, "to present in idyllic terms reactionary nationalist and religious vestiges which run counter to our ideology, to the socialist way of life, and to the scientific philosophy." How should we assess the attempted revision of the legacy of the Russian revolutionary democrats, when certain critics offer idyllic interpretations both of Ostrovskiy's "Dark Realm" [title of a article by Dobrolyubov analyzing Ostrovskiy's plays, which depicted Russian society before the abolition of serfdom] and of Goncharov's Oblomovism [Oblomov was the apathetic, weak-willed central character of Goncharov's novel]? Nor can it be tolerated that Lenin's teaching on the two cultures within each national culture is regarded by certain scholars as a mere tactical maneuver prompted by a specific historical stage.

In order to advance successfully, literature today has more need than ever for ideological precision and strictly regulated social class guidelines.

The widespread shortcomings of modern literature were spoken of at the congress. Showy verbosity, that throwback to the notorious "uncontroversial" approach, and gloomy forays into sordid naturalism are two sides of the same coin. They mark to an equal degree the substitution of a gloomy, mechanical imitation of life for a profound artistic study of all of its complexities and contradictions. This gives rise to that grayness which was expressed by the poet in these bitter lines: "And it is all alike, all the same as what is or could be, and it is all so impalatable that you want to howl out loud."

One cannot fail to be alarmed at the fact that there are still many works in which, instead of a full-blooded hero marked by the clarity and activeness of his life stance, the richness of his inner world, and true dialectics of feelings, there are characters of dubious moral qualities who skillfully disguise a "petit bourgeois mug" beneath the apparent "complexity" of trivial feelings. Such works are focused on the charms of the "good life," piquant details of intimate relationships, rows and squabbles, and the moral torments of the most commonplace rogue. There is still a significant percentage of worthless books made up of superficial sliding through life, wallowing in the mud of everyday trivia and squalor, and earthbound lackluster.

One important shortcoming of many modern works is timidity in the face of the true complexities of the life being depicted. It can happen that a writer addresses a topical theme, introduces genuinely current conflicts into his story, and tries to probe important traits of contemporary man. But these good intentions are to a significant degree rendered worthless by the usual stereotypes of artistic thought and the introduction of cliched situations and conflicts by way of subject matter and of familiar characters who crop up in book after book. This applies not to the opportunist who is always ready to "represent" everything that is "required," but to writers whose creative potential entitles us to expect more of them.

"Society expects from the writer artistic discoveries, the truth about life, which has always been the essence of real art," it was said at the congress. The truth about life is at the basis of many works which have become our Soviet classics. The struggle for Soviet power inspired writers to create Chapayev [by Furmanov] and Iron Torrent [Zheleznyy Potok by Serafimovich], Well and Good [Khorosho by Mayakovskiy] and The Rout [Razgrom by Fadeyev], Quiet Flows the Don [Tikhiy Don by Sholokhov] and The Road to Calvary [Khozhdeniye po Mukam by A.N. Tolstoy]. The socialist transformations of the first 5-year plans were incorporated in Virgin Soil Upturned [Podnyataya Tselina by Sholokhov], Sot [by Leonov], Forward, Oh Time! [Vremya, Vpered! by Katayev], People From the Backwoods [Lyudi iz Zakholustya by Malyshkin], and The Tanker 'Derbent' [Tanker 'Derbent' by Krymov]. The enthusiasm of the nationwide battle against fascism is conveyed to us by Vasiliy Terkin [by Tvardovskiy] and The Young Guard [Molodaya Gvardiya by Fadeyev], Invasion [Nashestviye by Leonov] and The Story of a Real Person [Povest o Nastoyashchem Cheloveke by Polevoy]. In contemporary literature there are also works remarkable, above all, for all their striving to attain a profound, multifaceted, living truth. Here we cannot but recall F. Abramov's Pryaslinyye, N. Dumbadze's Law of Eternity [Zakon Vechnosti], V. Bykov's Token of Disaster [Znak Bedy], and many other books which enshrine the typical traits of our difficult times.

Fidelity to the truth of life is one of the main criteria in assessing literary phenomena. Literary experts, aesthetes, philosophers, and critics argue a great deal about this concept. Today we must be particularly attentive toward the theoretical propositions put forward at the 27th CPSU Congress and seek in them the key to the clarification of the paramount complex problems of literature's development. We read in the CPSU Central Committee Political Report: "But truth is not an abstract concept. It is concrete. It lies in the people's achievements and the contradictions of society's development, in the heroism and daily grind of working life, in all its diversity, drama, and greatness. Only literature — ideologically committed, artistic, people's literature — educates people to be honest, strong in spirit, and capable of bearing the burden of their times."

If we proceed on the basis of the interpretation of literature's role and significance as one of the most important means of people's social and spiritual education, we can boldly assert that the main affair of literature is, above all, the profound and multifaceted comprehension of the socialist way of life. Given this essential condition, literature can give the reader that "lesson in truth" which was spoken of at the 27th CPSU Congress. This view of the matter orients the writer toward active involvement in life, the profound, thorough study of its trends and contradictions, and the ability to separate the primary from the secondary, the substantive from the accidental. This view demands the artistic embodiment of life in all its real complexity and resolutely rules out both "varnishing" and "blackening."

Deviation from the truth of life leads to substantial shortcomings in our contemporary literature and art. The 27th congress noted the "low standard of certain literary works, television programs, and movies, which suffer from a lack not only of ideological and aesthetic clarity, but of elementary taste."

It was also said that "there is a need for a substantial improvement in movie hire and book and journal publishing." Drawing an analogy with material production, we may say that in literature also, the notorious "gross production figures" often crowd out many important indicators — above all, quality. The consumer, however, does not favor such "output" with his attention. So numerous anthologies of poems and stories, novels and novellas gather dust in the bookstores and on the library shelves, books whose creators have been successful in only one thing — forcing, "pushing" their stillborn offspring through the publishing houses and journals' editorial offices.

In the struggle for the quality of literature, a major, responsible role belongs to criticism. And much as it grieves us to admit it, our literary criticism often fails to cope with this, its main role.

The 27th CPSU Congress resolution on the Political Report of the party Central Committee says: "Literary and artistic criticism must shake off complacency and deference to rank, be guided by precise aesthetic and class criteria in assessing works, and come out more actively against ideological aridity, showy verbosity, petty, sordid naturalism, opportunism, and time-serving."

Our criticism often describes in great detail literature's real — and, sometimes, imagined — successes and mentions shortcomings cautiously ("Won't people get worried?"). There are far fewer thoughtful, analytical articles and reviews which examine attentively, and with high commitment, both the strong and the weak aspects of modern literature than there are complimentary "responses." Criticism has acquired its own firm stereotypes. A book of very modest virtues is not infrequently extolled either because it is devoted to a topical subject or because of a sympathetic attitude toward an author whom it is customary to praise, so to speak, from inertia. Here criticism bypasses in bashful silence a fact of some importance: namely, the fact that the book reveals its author's poor knowledge of life, that its subject is banal and its heroes stilted, and that it is written in clumsy language which has nothing in common with the language of artistic literature. Thus, a bold, monumental canvas is created out of little lines. And this picture is firmly in contradiction with the demands of the times, which categorically exclude ostentation and ballyhoo.

Let us open some issues of our literary-artistic journals. A considerable proportion of their precious space is allocated, as a rule, either to articles in the literary portrait genre, or to items marking the birthdays of modern writers. The genre itself seems to presuppose a singular "poetic" form. People writing about a contemporary writer prefer not to analyze his creative work comprehensively and objectively, but to vie with one another in proposing toasts.

The party's raising of the question of increasing exactingness toward works nominated for top prizes is very timely. Until recently, the very fact of such a nomination seemed to automatically predetermine the tone of critical discussions of a work. Instead of businesslike, detailed study, criticism not infrequently adopted the genre of odes, which could hardly be more alien to its nature. But neither a work nor its author can be belittled in any way by a calm, objective critical examination. This approach on the part of criticism will reveal its true respect for a writer's talent.

The party requires the mass information media to be more thoughtful and flexible, and warns against the pursuit of sensational incidents. These demands apply fully to literary criticism, in which both songs of praise and sensational "dressing downs" are equally intolerable.

Here too, we must resolutely cut short any attempts to speculate on criticism, whereby, instead of a serious, thoughtful analysis of literary phenomena, first place is given to self-assertion by the writer and his desire to win laurels in the dubious field of noisy and unsubstantiated "exposures."

The party once again reminds us all of the essential conditions for literature's successful development: "tact, an understanding of the nature of creativity, and, without fail, love for literature and art and respect for talent." "The party supports and will support everything talented in literature and art which is permeated by the spirit of loyalty to the party and people," the 27th CPSU Congress resolution on the CPSU Central Committee Political Report says.

Our crucial times demand frank, open discussions. "In order to ensure that irresponsibility becomes a thing of the past, we must make it a rule to call things by their names and judge everything unequivocally," it was said at the congress. In literature, as in society as a whole, a psychological reorientation is needed. The shortcomings of our literature and criticism have a significant influence on the moral and psychological climate in the literary milieu. Singing people's praises and handing out laurels is far from being a harmless pursuit. All this gives rise to intolerance toward criticism on the part of a number of writers, who have become accustomed to seeing it as a kind of "good offices bureau." But a correct attitude toward criticism is a norm of our life, an important sign of professionalism on the part of a writer. One wonders: How can we talk of professionalism, when you only have to note the weaknesses of a particular book for complaints and refutations to come pouring into the editorial offices of newspapers and journals? Sometimes things get really strange. People get offended and indignant not only because of critical judgements, but because of the fact that a particular author feels he has been "undervalued" and "underpraised." He was expecting an article on a larger scale and in a more rapturous tone.

The party comes out resolutely against those who "take any observations about them badly and even persecute people who criticize." It is high time some literary people discarded forever their ambition, their claims to an exclusive place in literature.

There is much for our literature to do in the great and multisector economy. Our times themselves demand it. Multinational Soviet literature has rich and fruitful traditions, the most important of which is always to be with the party, with the people. It was with the people in routing the gangs of White Guards and foreign interventionists, building the giant plants and plowing the virgin lands in the energetic days and nights of the 5-year plans, standing firm unto death at Stalingrad and hoisting the Banner of Victory above the overthrown Reichstag, and raising the war-savaged national economy from the ashes. Today its place is in the front line of the nationwide battle for the acceleration of the country's socioeconomic development.

Speaking at the 27th CPSU Congress, G. Markov, first secretary of the USSR Writers Union board, said: "The psychological climate of the acceleration of the country's socioeconomic and spiritual development itself spurs on the writers. It is not a question of excessive haste, which is accompanied by bustle which can only do damage. What is needed is the intensification of creative labor, a restructuring of the rhythm of the writer's actual work."

The rich experience of our literature testifies that the most difficult tasks are within its powers. We may say with hope and confidence that talented new works will appear, in which Soviet writers will use their weapon — the artistic word — actively and passionately to help the party and people to resolve the very complex tasks of the present stage in our society's development.

Ukrainian Party Takes Action on Critical Remarks

[Unattributed report: "In the Ukrainian Communist Party Central Committee"]

[Excerpts] The Ukrainian Communist Party Central Committee has adopted a decision on the critical remarks, proposals, and requests made at the 27th Ukrainian Communist Party Congress. The decision notes the critical remarks addressed in the accountability report to the congress by the Ukrainian Communist Party Central Committee, in the report on the main guidelines for the economic and social development of the USSR for 1986-90 and up to the year 2000, and in the speeches by the delegates to the Central Committee Secretariat and departments, the Ukrainian Council of Ministers, and union- and republic-level ministries and departments. They apply to shortcomings in planning and management, in enterprise reconstruction, in material-technical supplies, in sociocultural construction, in the style of work performed by party committees, in the organization of control over and check on work performed to implement decisions, in the selection, distribution, and education of cadres, and in ideological activity.

The Ukrainian Communist Party Central Committee has requested the Ukrainian Council of Ministers, ministries, and departments to examine the critical remarks and proposals set forth in the Central Committee's accountability report, the report on the main guidelines, and the resolutions of the 27th Ukrainian Communist Party Congress, and to take appropriate measures.

The critical remarks, proposals, and requests addressed by the delegates of the 27th Ukrainian Communist Party Congress to administrative and economic bodies have been sent to the Ukrainian Council of Ministers to examine them and, along with ministries and departments, to take appropriate practical action on them.

The Ukrainian Communist Party Central Committee Secretariat and departments have been requested to take concrete measures on the critical remarks addressed in the Central Committee's accountability report and the congress delegates' speeches and to establish control over the appropriate ministries, departments, and public organizations complying with the proposals and requests. The critical remarks and proposals will also be taken into account in working out organizational and political measures to implement the decisions of the 27th CPSU and Ukrainian Communist Party Congresses.

The Central Committee has examined the progress made in implementing the CPSU and Ukrainian Communist Party Central Committee decisions on issues concerning the consolidation of labor discipline and overcoming drunkenness and alcoholism. It was noted that obkoms, gorkoms, raykoms, basic party organizations, administrative, trade union, Komsomol, economic, and law and order bodies have taken measures to boost socialist labor discipline, to promote a sober way of life, and to eliminate negative phenomena. In 1985, the losses of working time and the number of offenses committed and automobile accidents caused in the state of intoxication decreased.

At the same time, some party, administrative, trade union, Komsomol, and economic bodies have recently paid less attention to these issues. Regulations for trade in alcoholic drinks are being broken and the number of moonshine sources are significant. The work to requalify enterprises which made wines and liquors before, has been too slow. There have been frequent manifestations of equability, complacency, and trends to exaggerate what has been done. The measures of disciplinary, administrative, and public influence, provided under the law, are not being fully applied to infringers of labor discipline and drunkards. At a number of places, no significant changes for the better have been made in the organization of leisure time for people, particularly for young people.

Obkoms, gorkoms, raykoms, oblispolkoms, gorispolkoms, rayispolkoms, Ukrainian ministries, departments, the Ukrainian Trade Union Council and the Komsomol Central Committee have been requested to analyze the progress made in implementing party and government decisions on these issues, to eliminate the existing shortcomings, and to take additional concrete steps to raise the effectiveness of this work, as well as increase the responsibility of the Communists, primarily of leaders, for the steady pursuit of the line aimed at further boosting socialist labor discipline and at overcoming drunkenness and alcoholism.

Pugo Describes Latvian Successes for Press

LD030057 Moscow TASS International Service in Russian 1455 GMT 1 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow, 1 Mar (TASS) — Working people of Latvia (a Soviet Baltic republic) will exert every effort to implement the plans for scientific-technical progress, restructuring of the economy, and acceleration of the country's socioeconomic development, Boris Pugo, first secretary of the Central Committee of the republic's Communist Party declared. He was speaking at a meeting held in the press center of the 27th CPSU Congress given by a delegation of Latvian Communists for Soviet and foreign journalists.

Latvia is one of the smaller republics of the USSR, but at the same time is one of the most highly developed. Although it is 14th in the list of Soviet republics in terms of population and occupies only 0.3 percent of the country's territory, its share in the USSR's national income amounts to 1.3 percent. Soviet Latvia is first in the USSR in terms of per capita production.

Machine building and radio electronics are among the most highly-developed industries in the republic. The republic has also achieved good successes in agriculture.

Latvia is taking an active part in industrial integration and production cooperation between the CEMA member-countries and in the international division of labor, Boris Pugo said. In particular, forms of cooperation such as direct production links — for instance, with enterprises in the GDR — have been established.

Considerable importance is attributed in the republic to the development of science, with particular attention being given to strengthening its links with production, Bruno Purin, president of the Latvian Academy of Sciences, said.

In Latvia, a powerful modern scientific research complex has been created and whole scientific schools have been formed in such areas of fundamental and applied research as magnetic hydrodynamics, polymer mechanics, plasma chemistry, biotechnology, and organic synthesis. The republic's Academy of Sciences, which this year celebrates its 40th anniversary, maintains close scientific and technical links with hundreds of Soviet and foreign organizations, including those in a number of Western states.

Answering journalists' questions, Boris Pugo described as absurd the allegations by certain circles in the West that Latvia did not voluntarily become part of the USSR in 1940. Such insinuations, he said, give rise, perhaps, merely to laughter among inhabitants of the republic.

Every Latvian knows that the decision to submit to the USSR Supreme Soviet the request to become part of the unions of the SSR was adopted by the supreme Latvian government organ, which was elected by the majority of the people of Latvia by open vote.

Yeltsin Attends Factory Meeting

LD112059 Moscow Domestic Service in Russian 1600 GMT 11 Mar 86

[Text] The acceleration of the country's social and economic development, the party's course approved by the 27th CPSU Congress, has received the wide support of Muscovites and the entire Soviet people. This was stressed by participants in the unified political day held in Moscow today. In light of the congress decisions, participants in the unified political day analyzed ways of involving all labor collective members in active work to carry out economic and social reforms.

Success in the cause of acceleration, the speakers noted, will be ensured if existing reserves are tapped. First, the human factor needs to be promoted [aktivizirovat] and one needs to ensure that everyone should work conscientiously, creatively, and with full application at his place of work. On the path to the set goal it is imperative to resolutely overcome inertia and conservatism, all that is holding up public progress. Many addresses and conversations were devoted to explaining the CPSU's peace-loving foreign policy course. At enterprises, organizations, and institutions reports were delivered by secretaries, members of the office of the Moscow City Committee of the CPSU, leaders of Mossovet, rayon party, local soviet and economic organizations, and delegates to the 27th CPSU Congress.

Comrade Yeltsin, candidate member of the Politburo of the Central Committee of the CPSU and first secretary of the Moscow City Committee of the CPSU, addressed participants in the unified political day at the First Moscow Radio Components Works.

SOVETSKAYA ROSSIYA on Development Tasks

[Editorial: "Trajectory of Acceleration"]

[Text] The 27th CPSU Congress is approaching the conclusion of the discussion of the Basic Guidelines for the Economic and Social Development of the USSR in 1986-1990 and in the Period Through the Year 2000. This important document embodies the program stipulations of the CPSU Central Committee Political Report, concretizes the tasks which have to be performed by the end of this century, and defines the main guidelines for the qualitative transformation of productive forces and the social development of society. As Comrade N.I. Ryzhkov, chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers, noted in the report, the concept of acceleration, advanced by the CPSU Central Committee April Plenum, provides the core of the party's strategy at the contemporary stage. Let us ponder the following figures. It is planned to double the volume of national income and industrial output. An economic potential approximately equal to that accumulated throughout all the previous years of Soviet power will be created over a 15-year period by building up and fundamentally transforming the country's production apparatus.

This major step in the development of the country's material and technical base will make it possible to raise the people's prosperity and living standards to a qualitatively new level. Priority will be given to the solution of social problems in the main sphere of human activity — the production sphere. The share of manual labor will be more than halved here, and this will make it possible to release over 20 million persons from unskilled work and make their working routine creatively meaningful and a source of satisfaction. Radical solutions are planned for problems of material prosperity and spiritual development, which are particularly important for all strata of society. The issue primarily concerns the full satisfaction of effective demand for goods and services and the achivement of scientifically recommended rational nutrition norms. At present 80 percent of urban families occupy separate apartments. A task of major social significance must be implemented by the year 2000: to supply virtually every Soviet family with separate housing, either an apartment or an individual house. Fundamental improvements are planned for the material base of culture, leisure and sports, and the entire social sphere.

Of course, the scaling of such great heights in social production and people's prosperity within the set time will be possible only along the path of comprehensive and large-scale intensification of the national economy. The 12th 5-Year Plan is the first and an extremely responsible stage in the practical implementation of the party's long-term economic strategy. Its purpose is to launch our economy on a higher trajectory of development — the trajectory of acceleration. This is what determines the main task of the 5-year plan. Its essence consists of raising the pace and efficiency of the economy's development on the basis of accelerated scientific and technical progress, retooling and reconstruction of production, intensive utilization of the existing production potential, improvements in the management system and economic machinery, and. on this basis, the achievement of a further upsurge in the Soviet people's prosperity.

A close study of the report on the Basic Guidelines for the country's development shows us that the party's core concept is acquiring the specific features of plan calculations and targets. They render clearly perceptible the 12th 5-Year Plan's role as the initial dash in the relay race of economic acceleration. Let us look closely at the general indicators. Average annual industrial output growth rates will increase on the whole from 3.7 to 4.4 percent, with consumer goods output increasing from 3.9 to 4.6 percent. The growth of average annual agricultural production is planned to more than double. The volumes of sales of paid services to the population and retail commodity turnover will grow considerably faster than before. National income will grow by 3.5-4.0 percent per year and, in absolute terms, will increase by 60 percent during the 5-year period.

One of the fundamental features of the new 5-year plan is the fact that, for the first time, virtually the entire growth of national income and of output by industry and other production sectors is planned to result from increased labor productivity. Otherwise the national economy would need an additional force of more than 22 million workers. We simply have no such labor resources at our disposal. The saving of resources is becoming an equally important avenue in economic practice. Savings must become the main source for satisfying the additional requirements for fuel and raw and other materials. The enhancement of the quality of output and work must be perceived as perhaps the most acute and most urgent problem of efficiency. It has been repeatedly noted at the congress that this question is significant not only economically but also politically.

The acceleration of scientific and technical progress is the main lever of intensification. The demand to eliminate obstacles in the path of scientific and technical progress and ensure fundamental and revolutionary positive developments along all its avenues has been heard with renewed force at the 27th CPSU Congress. The solution of these questions will be shifted onto the tracks of practical work during the 12th 5-Year Plan period. For example, widespread assimilation of advanced technologies is planned. The scale of the application of membrane, laser, plasma, and other fundamentally new technologies will expand severalfold. The level of automation of production will rise twice as high, primarily through the preferential development of robotics. rotary and rotary-conveyor lines, and flexible automated systems. The utilization of fundamentally new construction materials offers enormous scope in terms of the reduction of resource-intensiveness. The scale of assimilation of new equipment and technologies planned for the 12th 5-Year Plan period will secure over two-thirds of labor productivity growth and will reduce industrial prime costs by R28 billion. For the time being, however, this represents only the potential. In order to ensure its materialization it is important to galvanize the activity of academic, sector, and plant-level science and create favorable conditions for creative labor by innovators, engineers, designers, and scientists. While restructuring the economic machinery in this direction, it is necessary to enhance by all means the responsibility borne by our industry's leaders and primarily by the ministries.

The course of accelerating intensification has brought fundamental changes in investment policy. In order to lay the foundations for boosting the rates of the country's socioeconomic development in the next decade, it has been deemed expedient to undertake an increase in production capital investments from the former 16 percent to 25 percent in the new 5-year plan period. Does this mean that it will be necessary to reduce the consumption fund? No. In fact, under the conditions of rising social production efficiency, the absolute total of consumption expenditure will increase by an additional R19 billion during the 5-year plan period. The population's real incomes will rise.

Here is a typical feature of the new 5-year plan: The broad front of retooling is combined with vitally necessary new construction, primarily in the country's eastern regions. One-half of capital investments will be channeled into the reconstruction of existing production. There will be a sharp increase in the renewal of the operational part of the production apparatus. As enterprises transfer to conditions of financial autonomy, the production development funds accumulated by labor collectives must become the main source of finance for retooling. Particular urgency in this connection is given to the provision of material and technical resources for self-financed operations.

Sharp criticism was leveled from the congress rostrum against the central element of investment policy — the capital construction system. The unsatisfactory work of construction organizations, their weak industrial base, and the dissipation of funds lead to construction schedule overruns, excessive volumes of incomplete construction work, and the build up of stocks of equipment awaiting installation. The weak potential of contracting organizations in a number of regions held back economic and social development and inflicted tangible damage on the rational deployment of productive forces. It has been noted at the congress that the problems of capital construction must be solved without any delay. All components there must be radically improved as soon as possible.

The Basic Guidelines attach exceptionally serious significance to structural policy, the choice of priorities, and the determination of intersector and intrasector proportions. The plans envisage preferential growth of the end product in comparison with the so-called intermediate product. Growth rates in the processing sectors producing machines, equipment, and consumption items will be twice as high as in the sectors supplying fuel, raw materials, and semimanufactures. This positive development relies to a significant extent on the policy of resource saving. Another structural feature is the preferential development of electricity generation, the chemical and petrochemical industries, and, of course, machine building. These sectors are called upon to ensure that the national economy reaches leading levels of world scientific and technical progress. Finally, from the very first steps into the 5-year plan, all sectors of our industry will be oriented toward the production of consumer goods and the development of the services sphere to a greater extent than previously. Thus, the structural policy of the 12th 5-Year Plan is subordinated to the tasks of utmost intensification, follows precise social directions, and lays a firm foundation for strengthening the national economy's material and technical base.

It was noted at the 27th CPSU Congress that the successful implementation of our plans and tasks depends to a decisive extent on the improvement of management and economic activity methods in line with the new economic conditions and contemporary demands. Analyzing the causes of the slowdown of the pace of socioeconomic development, the congress delegates singled out the underestimation of the radical restructuring of the management system as one of the main causes. This work was done slowly and halfheartedly. Preference for old-fashioned management methods, mainly for management by administrative order, gained the upper hand. Stagnation in thinking invariably led to stagnation in actions. The party drew the necessary conclusions. A clear-cut task has been set: to implement major measures to improve the entire management system in order to significantly boost its efficiency and orient it toward the radical acceleration of scientific and technical progress and utmost activation of the human factor. Relying on the immutable principle of democratic centralism, we will strengthen and improve the centralized planned management of the economy. At the same time, work will continue more decisively to expand the financial independence and responsibility of labor collectives. Particularly great importance is given to the deepening of all elements of financial autonomy, the development of systems of economic norms, and the more active involvement of working people in the management of enterprise and association affairs.

Following approval by the 27th CPSU Congress, the Basic Guidelines for economic and social development will become a program for action by the party, the state, and the whole Soviet people. Now it is a matter of translating the set plans into reality with total determination, relying on the living creativity of the masses and the nationwide socialist competition.

Ferrous Metallurgy Minister on Problems, Outlook

LD101951 [Editorial Report] Moscow Television Service in Russian at 1600 GMT on 10 March on its First Program carries a 20-Minute "Acceleration" program hosted by Political Observer V.P. Beketov. A film of "one of the days of the 27th CPSU Congress" is shown during the opening portion of the program. Beketov notes that the word "acceleration" was one of the most widely used at the congress, representing as it does one of the most urgent requirements of the times. The film on the congress is shown showing delegates mingling in the foyer of the Moscow Palace of congress.

Beketov notes that this first post-congress edition of the "Acceleration" program is devoted to "problems of the further development of one of the national economy's most important branches: namely, ferrous metallurgy."

Participating in the program are Sorafim Vasiliyevich Kolpakov, USSR minister of ferrous metallurgy; Vladimir Mikhaylovich Shunin, a steelworker from Magnitka; Viktor Ivanovich Agapitov, an excavator driver from the Lebedi mining and enrichment combine in Belgorod Oblast; Aleksey Fedorovich Kuznetsov, director of the Kuznetsk netallurgical combine; and Nikolay Pavlovich Lyakishev, Bardin Central Scientific Research Institute of Ferrous Metallurgy director's USSR Academy of Sciences corresponding member.

Beketov initiates the discussion by turning to Minister Kolpakov to elaborate on his idea regarding the concept of restructuring an industry "on the move," which in his view began as of the April (1985) Central Committee Plenum and has since gathered pace with an improvement "without exception" in the work of all enterprises, in better organization and management and good results during 1985, which continues in the precongress period as well. What is needed now is an acceleration in these improvements. He says that acceleration comprises a continuation and strengthening of discipline from worker to minister, responsibility for the final result, and rapid reconstruction and technical reequipment of all enterprises, expanding the range of and producing good-quality output. Prompted by Beketov who is referring to capital investment figures for industry during the 12th 5-year period, Kolpakov says this work began on a broad front in the last (11th) 5-year period, with the elaboration of a special detailed program for the development, reconstruction, and technical reequipment of enterprises in the ferrous metallurgy industry. The validity of this program has been confirmed by the Central Committee. He adds that the present task is to complete the tasks it sets in good time.

Beketov then turns to Aleksey Fedorovich Kuznetsov, who says that to satisfy clients the combine needs reliable modern technology to operate without interruption while producing high-quality output. He notes that transferring to continuous casting methods will save metal.

Beketov reads some of the criticism directed at science, especially industrial science, contained in the general secretary's Political Report to congress, which Lyakishev recognizes as being just. He goes on to stress the importance of science for production industry and says that the most modern processes have been put into the ferrous metallurgy plan in the 12th 5-year period. Close cooperation between science and production is a guarantee of success. Science, he adds, needs to concentrate on the main issues and not to get side-tracked in the future.

Kolpakov interrupts, singling out Chelyabinsk Scientific Research Institute and Gubkino Institute as having particular shortcomings and requiring an immediate restructuring of ther operations.

Beketov offers the other participants the opportunity to elaborate what they see to be requirements from science, offering the microphone first to Kuznetsov. The latter suggests that technologically new processes be perfected before being brought to production. Agapitov, the excavator operator, wonders when the scientific and technical revolution will reach him, as he basically works on excavators of 20-year-old design from the Izhorskiy works. Work cannot be further improved without new equipment to meet the requirements of the job.

Beketov switches the topic to the need for a psychological restructuring of cadres. Kuznetsov says that restructuring has been brought about by necessity, as the old organizational methods have produced an operation now said to be unsatisfactory. He adds that there will be much discussion on how to find new forms of labor organization and corresponding incentives. He cites the Kuznetsk works laboratory for mechanization and automation as an example of how, given a specific task, so much time is taken over it that the task's significance is lost and there is no return on the salaries paid. He believes all restructuring must be aimed at working for the effect alone: if a laboratory prodeces no results, it should be disbanded. Specific groups must be formed to deal with a specific task, giving people minimum pay as a right and then leaving it up to them to earn more on top of that. The combine is not reluctant to pay a lot of money to a person when it has been earned, and they have many talented people there.

Lyakishev says that much depends upon how a scientist perceives his work is being received and acted upon. A good atttitude results from seeing work rapidly assimilated into production industry. He says that cooperation with industry is vital; however, there are still scientists working without being given a specific topic from industry. Industry must ask for the work it wants to be accomplished. Agapitov says that we are not only talking about leading cadres, but also of how each person fits into the collective, thus raising the matter of providing good services, amenities, and leisure opportunities. Kuznetsov takes up the theme of how the aim of all discussed at the congress is to benefit the people and that industry does all it can to see that needed projects are implemented for people's amenities. The concluding 5 minutes of the program are taken up with Agapitov stressing that people work better with good amenities, particular with the opportunity to vacation with the entire family on the Black Sea. Shunin concurs on this point, as does Kolpakov, who assert that most enterprises have all conveniences, but provision is being made to continually improve a situation that is not perfect.

Tomsk Congress Delegate on Siberian Development

[Text] Moscow, March 5 TASS — A TASS correspondent reports from the Kremlin:

The term "development" as applicable to Siberia and the Far East is nothing new in the vocabulary of Soviet economists. Industrial development of that vast region has been conducted for several decades now. Suffice it to mention the metallurgical industry of Komsomolsk on Amur, oil-bearing Sakhalin, diamond-mining Yakutiya, power stations on the Yenisey, Angara, Bureya, oil and gas-bearing Tyumen (by the way, Tyumen is the first Russian city in Siberia founded back in the late 16th century), and finally, the Baykal-Amur Mainline and gas deposits of the extreme north.

All the vast natural wealth and industrial potential of Siberia has now been switched into the country's working conveyor, said Pyotr Pronyagin of Tomsk, delegate of the 27th CPSU Congress. Predictions of great minds of Russia about bright future of that area have come true, the CPSU's strategic plans for the development of Siberia and the Far East, and speedy and economically rational development at that, are being implemented.

While in the past trailblazers of the eastern regions of the country were at times loosing sight of the need to ensure continuity and of those who will come into the area after them, set themselves the task above all to get the biggest amount of natural resources, the approach is different now. Much thought is given to the price at which this is achieved.

Thus, a petrochemical complex was quickly built in Tomsk, but its facilities are used only to 60 per cent. The enterprise does not have enough personnel, and did not have complete equipment.

Considerable volumes of oil are extracted in these areas of Western Siberia, but as a rule, oil is pumped to other districts, to industrialized centres, while thousands of tons of benzine for ethylene production are being brought to this complex in Tomsk. This discrepancy results from the fact that an oil refinery has not been built there in time.

The development of minerals, naturally, requires sources of energy. And the closer they are situated to mining areas, the better. This combination is achieved not everywhere and not at once. Difficulties with the energy supply arose, for instance, in Yakutia. They were mentioned at the congress by Yakutiya's delegate Yuriy Prokopiev. Large deposits fo iron and apatite ores, coal and other minerals have been discovered in that autonomous republic which is known for diamond mining. But energy is necessary in order to start creating the metallurgical industry and agricultural chemistry. This was pointed out at the congress by Yakutiya's representative.

Raising acute problems, delegates of the congress speak openly about what has not yet been done and what remains to be done. They have no fear of truth for they are aware of their strength and their abilities, know the ways of remedying shortcomings and miscalculations, have faith in the rightness of the cause of the party and regard as participants in that cause themselves and those who sent them to the forum of the Soviet Communists.

Development of Caspian Oil Fields Examined

LD120031 [Editorial Report] Moscow Domestic Service in Russian at 1540 GMT on 11 March broadcasts a 20-minute program by special correspondent Aleksandr Belotserkovets on the Caspian oil and gas region. Belotserkovets begins this program by on the establishment of Kazakhstan's newest oil deposit in Aktyubinsk Oblast with a description of the Caspian depression, an area 1,000 by 500 km which includes the deposits of Emba — known for its very pure oil; Tengiz; Kalamkas and Karazhanbas in the Buzachi peninsula, with thousands of boreholes already on stream in the desert; the Astrakhan oil and gas complex; and many others. The guidelines for the country's development note the great potential of the area. Focusing on Aktyubinsk Oblast, Belotserkovets quotes Academician Nadirov on the importance of the discovery of Zhanazhol deposit in 1978 as well as the discovery in 1981 of a second oil stratum there and at the neighboring Kenkiyak deposit.

Belotserkovets says when he visited Aktyubinskneftegaz association, they had just been awarded a money prize and the Challenge Red Banner for the second quarter of 1985, having set good results all year. The association's chief engineer (Baldenbayev) says: "Over the 11th 5-year period the volume of oil recovered increased more than fivefold and the volume of drilling more than tenfold. For the first time in the USSR an oil deposit with a high content of hydrogen sulphide and carbonic acid gas has been commissioned. Our Kenkiyak deposit has very viscous oil laying at a depth of up to 400 meters. To increase the efficiency of oil recovery, steam at high temperature — 276 degrees — and at 60 atmospheres pressure is injected. We have tested and brought into use domestically produced steam generator equipment."

Belotserkovets then discusses Zhanazhol itself, noting that "probably the main feature of Zhanazhol deposit is that it has a high content of hydrogen sulphide and other — as the specialists call them — aggressive elements in the oil. This in no way reduces the value of the fuel recovered, but on the contrary provides the opportunity for obtaining additional products which are very important for the national economy, primarily sulphur, which is so prized in the chemical industry. And on the other hand, hydrogen sulphide literally dissolves the pipelines and equipment. This kind of oil is present at Mangyshlak and at many other deposits, and the recovery of it in the country is a problem."

In a discussion with representatives from the Ufa Experimental Oil Institute and Krasnodar Experimental Oil Institute, Belotserkovets discovers that Zhanazhol is very important for the development of the bigger deposit of Tengiz, where the content of hydrogen sulphide is up to 25 percent by volume, as there is as yet in the country no experience in exploiting this kind of deposit. The Krasnodar institute is working on protection of gas equipment and Ufa is working on protection of surface oil equipment. Hydrogen sulphide is a very corrosive agent. A test-site is being built for the modelling, predicting, and testing of reagents against the corrosion. Work includes development of the inhibitor which is most promising in Donetsk, testing of a new kind of steel, of which an experimental batch has been manufactured in Chelyabinsk, and Nikopol and Pervouralsk metallurgical works are now working on this.

Belotserkovets goes on to say that while this is an excellent example of the cooperation of science and production, the scientists of Kazakhstan Scientific Research and Design Institute of Oil could do a lot to supervise the development of deposits, particularly Uzen, where corrosion is also enemy No 1. He says that, unfortunately, the idea of creating a department of the Kazakh Academy of Sciences, which would deal with all aspects of recovery and refining of oil, has been talked about for years and is still "at the decision stage." "The oilmen at Kenkiyak and Zhanazhol have, under these circumstances, been able to find their own ways of solving the complex problems." In the second quarter of last year Zhanazhol recovered its first million metric tons of oil, and enhanced pledges have been met. "Oil recovery continues to increase, but this is happening far from as quickly as would be liked."

Inquiring into why this should be, Belotserkovets explains that two comprehensive programs have been written up in detail at Aktyubinskneft to help the oilmen to increase oil recovery by 3.5 times in the current 5-year period as compared with the eleventh 5-year period. One program is for the intensification of drilling boreholes, the other is for oil recovery. (V.V. Sviridov), a delegate to the 16th Congress of the Kazakhstan Communist Party who has worked in the Caspian depression for 3 years and is now at Nefteyugansk in the north, explains how every borehole is different to drill. He recalls successful work in Kazakhstan and describes the life of a drilling team. Belotserkovets recalls the speech to the party congress by V.A. Dinkov, USSR minister for the oil industry, in which he spoke of a complex but attainable task of reducing the cost of drilling by no less than 6 percent per meter. (Sviridov) explains that for this to be achieved there is still much to be done, noting that in field conditions they are not able to carry out repairs to equipment, and as the period taken for repairs gets longer, this affects the work of the whole team. "We could, of course, drill much more and better if all the time standing idle for repairs were eliminated, if there were a base. Naturally, there would be more boreholes, and, of course, more oil would be recovered."

Belotserkovets goes on to say: "Yes, the builders are now greatly indebted to the drillers and oilmen. And this relates particularly to the work of the Ministry for the Construction of Oil and Gas Industry Enterprises. No, one cannot say that measures are not being taken in the ministry to speed up the construction of the bases and deposit facilities which are so needed. The Aktyubinsknetftegazstroy trust has been formed. A whole central directorate has been formed to help and guide it." The Aktyubinskneft association has, through its own resources, done construction and installation work worth R8 million, while the builders have done almost as much, although their only job is to build. "This is what is happening. The one produces above-plan oil and gas and raw material for the chemical industry, while the other has missed plans and is now working out measures to improve construction."

In an interview, the association's chief engineer (N.U. Baltembayev) says: "In our view, the main reasons were poor organization of work, obvious shortages of human resources in the construction of oil field sites, lack of provision of building equipment and a poor standard of engineering and technical preparation of sites under construction." This situation was assessed exactly during the party congress, where leaders said that they are striving to improve things, but nothing is being changed in essence. Belotserkovets talks to (V.A. Timoshinov,) deputy director of the association for capital construction above the lack of change in the situation regarding housing and domestic services construction, done in this region by the Ministry of Heavy Machine Building of the USSR. He says: "Unfortunately, the Mintyazhstroy building organizations in the 11th 5-year period did not fulfill the tasks set for them. They fulfilled the plan for bringing housing into use by 60-70 percent, and failed to hand over a large amount of houses in the town of Oktyabrsk." Belotserkovets recalls his visit to Oktyabrsk, where he saw children attend school in three shifts in the only school, where there is just one kindergarten. (Timishinov) says a broad front of construction is planned for Oktyabrsk in the 12th 5-year period: 70,000 square meters of housing, a school, a kindergarten, and other cultural and domestic facilities.

Belotserkovets then recalls a conversation about careers with some of the children at the overcrowded school. "There are now drillers, power workers, and geologist-prospectors coming in by train or flying in by plane from many towns of the country. But the work-shift method [vakhtovoy metod], for all its pros, has its drawbacks too. And today, as never before, the issue of training qualified workers locally is an acute one. There is a very great need for a vocational-technical college, with a hostel, and, of course, workshops. But things go no further than talking about it; and this year and for the immediate future, construction of a college is not envisaged. And yet the Aktyubinsk area, where the prospectors are working enthusiastically, remains endowed with finds: new oil deposits have already appeared on the map: (Ulekhtau), (Kazasay). Five days ago the 27th party congress concluded its work. And I think that now all participants in the enormous work of developing the oil and gas complex of the Caspian depression must be guided by the main idea of the congress, the need for acceleration in all our affairs, to work more efficiently, to manage competently, assiduously and energetically."

Azerbaijan Vessels — The shipbuilders of fraternal Yugoslavia built four ferryboats for the Caspian Maritime Administration during the past, 11th, 5-Year Plan period. The vessels are currently operating between Baku and Krasnovodsk. Yet another ferryboat has been built and launched by the Yugoslav shipbuilders recently. Captain Aliyev, who works on distant lines, has arrived in Pula, Yugoslavia, to bring it to the Caspian Sea. The vessel is capable of carrying dozens of railway freight cars and up to 200 passangers on each trip. [Summary] [Baku Domestic Service in Azeri 0205 GMT 6 Jan 86 GF]

Tashkent Subway — The construction of a new subway line has begun in Tashkent, the capital of Uzbekistan. The new line will link the city center with one of the new residential areas and with the students' town. The length of the new subway line will be 6 km. The length of the already existing subway in Tashkent is currently more than 20 km. [Summary] [Tashkent International Service in Uzbek 1700 GMT 13 Jan 86 GF]

Automatic Vessel Guidance — In a report from the Ilyichevsk port, traffic control Captain (?Khlebnikov) talks about a new automatic control of movement of sea vessels of the northwest part of the Black Sea which is called (?bris). He says that a computer supplies data such as course, speed, and so forth, which are displayed on a screen. The computer also supplies data about diviation from a route and helps to prevent collisions. He says that more 20,000 vessels pass through the zone each year. He also says that work is being done at present to develop a system in which the data displayed on the screen can be conveyed directly with the aid of telemetry to display screens on vessels instead of using radio as is the case is at present. Krasnovodsk Port Reconstruction — A new oil handling complex which was put in operation today in the Krasnovodsk port will help increase the handling capacity of the part. Reconstruction of the quay, which was in fact 10 times cheaper than construction of a new one would have been, was necessary to cope with the increase of productivity of the Krasnovodsk oil processing works and with the need to transport the products via the Caspian Sea from Turkmenistan to [name indistinct]. Now up to 5,000 ton vessels can be handled in the port. In the 12th 5-Year Plan, after a full reconstruction of the cargo handling area of the port, the port's handling capacity will treble. Reportage on Launch of Manned 'Soyuz T-15'

'Functioning Normally,' Crew Well

LD131301 Moscow TASS in English 1256 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow, March 13 Tass — The Soviet Union launched at 15:33 Moscow time today the Soyuz T-15 spaceship under its program of space exploration. The ship is piloted by a crew consisting of Colonel Leonid Denisovich Kizim, pilot cosmonaut of the USSR, two times Hero of the Soviet Union (flight commander), and Pilot Cosmonaut of the USSR Vladimir Alekseyevich Solovyov, Hero of the Soviet Union (flight engineer).

Under the program of the mission, the ship is to bring the crew to the Mir research station, put into a near-earth orbit on February 20, 1986, and scientific and technical studies and experiments are to be conducted aboard the station. The docking of the two spacecraft is scheduled for March 15.

According to telemetry data, the onboard systems of the Soyuz T-15 spaceship are functioning normally.

Cosmonauts Leonid Kizim and Vladimir Solovyov feel well.

Parameters Updated

LD141032 Moscow TASS in English 1022 GMT 14 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow, March 14 TASS — The Soyuz T-15 spaceship with a crew of Leonid Kizim and Vladimir Solovyev made 14 revolutions around the earth by noon Moscow time [0900 GMT].

Under the flight program, the cosmonauts have carried out standard operations to check the air tightness of the ship compartments and onboard systems and corrected the orbit.

Today the crew will continue preparations for docking with the Mir research station. To this end another long-range rapprochement manoeuvre will be executed.

The measurements of the trajectory show that the parameters of the orbit of Soyuz T-15 at present are as follows: maximum distance from the earth surface — 298 kilometres, minimum distance from the earth surface — 240 kilometres, period of revolution — 89.7 minutes, inclination — 51.6 degrees.

The mission is proceeding normally. Leonid Kizim and Vladimir Solovyev are in good health and feel well.

TV, Radio Report Launch

LD131539 [Editorial Report] Moscow Television Service in Russian at 1215 GMT on 13 March carries a relay conducted by Aleksandr Galkin from Baykonur space center on the launch of the manned Soyuz T-15 space craft. Galkin opens the report by saying that the cosmonauts boarded the craft 1 and 1/2 hours ago, and that all systems are in order. Video is then shown of the two cosmonauts, Kuzim and Solovyov, in space suits, seated with cosmonaut training program leader Shatalov while awaiting final checks. The two men are then seen making an official report before boarding a bus waiting on the tarmac.

Galkin resumes his report at 1221 GMT along with correspondent Aleksandr Tikhomirov from the mission control room, accompanied by Cosmonaut Atkov and former Cosmonauts Leonov and Malyshev. They are shown in front of large screens depicting details of previous space flights.

At 1226 GMT live shots of the cosmonauts in recumbent position inside the space craft are shown; they say they feel well and have slept well. This is followed at 1227 GMT with a female voice heard announcing that all is ready. A medium shot of the space craft on the launch pad is then shown.

Tikhomirov and correspondent Viktor Blagov are then shown in the control room; they describe the work of the flight control center and give details depicted on large screens of the Mir space station flight.

At 1229 GMT another shot of the space craft on the launch pad is shown, with vapor seen swirling around its base. Galkin says there are just seconds to go, and the camera shows another shot of the two cosmonauts inside the space craft. This is followed by a long shot of the craft. Galking and Atkov then offer their wishes for everything to go well. At 1231 GMT there is a brief shot of the list of launch commands, followed by a long shot of the craft on the launch pad, set against a clear sky and with no vapor swirling around its base. The support gantry is then shown swinging away from the craft.

Communication from the control room are then heard, and the ignition command is announced. The camera shows smoke coming from the base of the craft and the craft lifting off vertically and then to the right of camera. Control is heard saying: 50 seconds, all normal; 90 seconds, engines reliable; all onboard systems okay. The cosmonauts are then shown inside the craft, with Kizim on the left of the screen and Solovyov on the right, lying in a supine position. At one point Kizim looks to his right. Control is heard reporting every 10 seconds on the state of the craft's systems.

At 1238 Galkin ends the space launch relay by returning to newsreader Igor Kirillov, who is in the studio. Kirillov reads biographies of Kizim and Solovyov.

Moscow Domestic Service in Russian at 1215 GMT on 13 March also carries a relay on the Soyuz T-15 launch, conducted by Nikolay Neych in the studio and correspondent Petr Pelekhov at the Baykonur space center. Pelekhov describes the weather conditions for the launch as being excellent, despite some snow, and says that the launch will take place at the appointed time: 1233 GMT and 7 seconds. Neych introduces correspondent Sergey Zheleznyak at flight control center, who describes the scene prior to the launch. At 1233 GMT Pelekhov describes the lift-off, saying that the light is blinding. At 1237 GMT he says that the space craft is now out of sight. He signs off at 1245 GMT after giving brief progress reports. After Zheleznyak reports on the cosmonauts' work being checked, he signs off at 1247 GMT.

Neych then replays Shatalov's remarks on the benefits to be derived from the work planned for the cosmonauts. Neych ends the relay at 1250 GMT.

Moscow Domestic Service in Russian at 1330 GMT on 13 March carries a report conducted by Nikolay Neych on the Soyuz T-15 flight. Zheleznyak at the flight control center says the preparations for docking have already begun and checks are being carried out on the automatic approach system. He then tells Neych that another communications session will be held in 5 minutes, 21 seconds. At this point Zheleznyak says that at the last communications session the cosmonauts had reported that getting into orbit had gone well and all systems were acting normally.

He then reports that flight control center is in communciation with the Mir orbiting station, which has just completed 344 orbits of the earth. Neych concludes the report at 1335 GMT.

Flight, Crew Details

LD131345 Moscow TASS in English 1303 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow, March 13 TASS — TASS special correspondent Nikolay Zheleznov reports from Baykonur Cosmodrome.

The spaceship "Soyuz T-15", launched today, is to dock in two days' time with the new orbital station "Mir" (peace) sent up a month ago. With this mission, Vladimir Shatalov, who is in charge of cosmonauts' training, said at the cosmodrome, we are beginning long-term work aboard broad-purpose multi-module orbital complexes.

The spaceship is to dock with the Mir station, as usual, at one of the two main docking units positioned along the station's longitudinal axis. Four additional units of the station's airlock are intended for adding specialized modules — for nature, technological, biological and astrophysical studies — to the station.

The first flight to the Mir station is to be made by an experienced crew consisting of Kizim and Solovyov, who went on a 237-day expedition in 1984 aboard the Salyut-7 station which is now on an unmanned flight. Leonid Kizim, the crew commander, 45, is an Air Force colonel, experienced pilot and cosmonaut. This is his third space flight. Aboard the Salyut-7 he directed the reception of two visiting expeditions including a Soviet-Indian one. His colleague, Vladimir Solovyov, graduate of Moscow's Bauman Higher Technical School, is 40. This is his second space flight which he makes in a new capacity, as deputy mission director at the Mission Control Centre near Moscow. He was awarded the Order of the Honorary Legion for taking part, as a back-up, in a Soviet-French space flight.

Arctic Scientists Survey Ice Floe Movements

LD132153 Moscow TASS International Service in Russian 1610 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Summary] Leningrad, 13 Mar (TASS) — Soviet scientists studying the Arctic have begun a program of flights in light biplanes over the Northern seas and the Arctic Ocean landing on ice-floes. They will make over 150 such landings at different sites to study the state of the ice-cover and the atmosphere. The data will be processed by a computer center in Leningrad, where mathematical forecasting and climatic models have been developed for vast areas of the Northern Hemisphere.

Boris Krutskikh, an institute director, says that such observations aid in the understanding of atmospheric processes and help plot the course of drifting ice. This is essential for improvements in weather forecasting and for determining conditions for navigation on the Northern Sea route. The data are passed on to international weather centers.

At the same time, SP-26 is being evacuated after completing its work. Some of its equipment will be flown to SP-28, for which a suitable floe is now being sought. On SP-27, which has been damaged by cyclones, a new landing strip has been laid out and a new group of 20 scientists is on its way, for a year's tour of duty.

Distant Outer Space Telescope — Yerevan, February 24 TASS — A new telescope for the exploration of distant outer space has been constructed on the slope of the Aragats Mountian in Soviet Armenia at an altitude of 1,800 metres above sea level. The antenna cup which may freely accomodate an ice-hockey ground with stands for the audience is made of 3,800 one metre and a half duraluminium panels processed with exquisite accuracy. They make a mirror of 54 metres in diameter. A big 2.6 metre optical telescope was assembled on its turning axes for the first time in the world practice of building such telescopes, which makes it possible to conduct observations simultaneously in radio and light wave bands. The spheres of application of the new radio-optical telescope embraces radio astronomy and astronomy, search for extra-terrestrial civilisations and measurement of parameters of various sources of radio frequency radiation. characteristics of the atmosphere of the earth and other planets. If needed, it can also be used for super distant space communications. [Text] [Moscow TASS in English 1714 GMT 24 Feb 86 LD]

New Siberian Research Institute — A new scientific research, design, and technology institute has been opened in the Siberian oil workers' town of Surgut. The staff there will work on engineering preparations for the installation of gas and petroleum industry facilities. There is an obvious need for such an institute due to the concentration of oil and gas fields in the extreme north of Tyumen Oblast and central Priobye. Moreover, these fields are situated in conditions which make exploitation difficult. [Summary] [Moscow Domestic Service in Russian 1100 GMT 23 Feb 86 LD]

U.S. PROPOSAL EVASION OF SOVIET TEST BAN OFFER

LD151046 Moscow TASS International Service in Russian 1022 GMT 15 Mar 86

[Text] Washington March 15 TASS -- The White House has said that President Reagan has put forward a proposal on the limitation of nuclear testing. Yet this proposal, which the White House described as highly specific and far reaching, has proved, in the opinion of political observers, to be a new U.S. political maneuver aimed at evading a concrete answer to the Soviet Union's proposal on ending all nuclear testing.

Reagan's proposal is of a very limited character and concerns only technical problems of "verification" of the Treaty on the Limitation on Underground Nuclear Weapons Tests and the Treaty on Underground Nuclear Explosions for Peaceful Purposes. These treaties were concluded between the USSR and the United States in 1974 and 1976 respectively, but have not been ratified so far, by no means through the Soviet side's fault.

Moreover, it follows from the White House statement that the United States is planning to conduct a new nuclear weapons test in Nevada in the third week of April. To camouflage its obviously negative stand on ending all nuclear explosions, the U.S. Administration has again resorted to the already familiar propaganda gimmick, by proposing that the Soviet Union send its scientists to watch these tests.

The Soviet Union, as known, is in favor of verifying [kontrol] the cessation of nuclear explosions, but it is against the cessation of tests being substituted by their continuation in the presence of observers. Disarmament without verification [kontrol] is impossible, but verification [kontrol] without disarmament makes no sense either.

14 MAR FOREIGN MINISTRY PRESS CONFERENCE REPORTED

PM161509 Moscow KRASNAYA ZVEZDA in Russian 15 Mar 86 Second Edition p 5

[TASS report: "End Nuclear Tests; Moscow Press Conference"]

[Text] A press conference for Soviet and foreign journalists was held at the USSR Foreign Ministry Press Center 14 March in connection with the reply by M.S. Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, to the joint message from the leaders of Argentina, India, Mexico, Tanzania, Sweden, and Greece on the question of ending nuclear tests. The press conference was chaired by V.G. Komplektov, USSR deputy foreign minister; V.F. Petrovskiy, member of the USSR Foreign Ministry Collegium; Academician M.A. Sadovskiy, director of the USSR Academy of Sciences Earth Physics Institute; Colonel General N.F. Chervov, chief of a USSR Armed Forces General Staff Directorate; and V.V. Lomeyko, chief of the USSR Foreign Ministry Press Section.

The press conference opening statement stated that the appeals by prestigious figures from countries in various continents to the Soviet and U.S. leadership on urgent questions of the day have been a significant factor in international life promoting the arrangement and development of extensive dialogue in the world.

The Soviet Union makes a high assessment of the activity of the influential figures in the six countries who, through their efforts, are promoting an improvement in the international situation and the quest for mutually acceptable accords in the interests of security for all.

The correspondents' attention was drawn first and foremost to the fact that, in response to the appeal from the leaders of the six countries addressed to the USSR and the United States not to conduct any nuclear tests in the period prior to the next Soviet-U.S. summit, the Soviet Union states that it will not conduct any nuclear explosions even after 31 March -- until the first nuclear explosion in the United States. The Soviet Union is thereby demonstrating its highly responsible attitude to the problem of a nuclear test ban. It is now up to the U.S. Administration, to which the appeal to join the moratorium is primarily addressed.

Not conducting tests means putting a stop to the improvement of nuclear weapons and starting practical movement toward their complete and universal elimination. If there is a real desire for this goal there can be no reason for not taking that step.

Not conducting nuclear explosions -- which it is proposed to start in practice with a joint Soviet-U.S. moratorium -- is seen by us as a radical solution to the problem of nuclear weapons tests. The USSR, as M.S. Gorbachev stressed in his reply to the message, attaches great importance to drawing up an agreement on the complete and final resolution of this problem in international law and proposes embarking on the elaboration of a corresponding treaty on a bilateral, trilateral, or multilateral basis with no linkage to any other questions.

The provision of adequate verification [kontrol] of the observance of accords on ending nuclear weapons tests is, the USSR believes, of particular importance. And the Soviet Union, as is well known, is decisively in favor of such verification, and the most strict verification at that. We have already suggested to the U.S. side that meetings between experts from the two countries be arranged in order to elaborate the relevant procedures for the reciprocal nonconducting of nuclear explosions.

At the same time the leaders of the "six" were informed that the Soviet Union is prepared to make use of their proposal -- if adopted by the U.S. side -- to provide assistance in monitoring [proverka] the ending of nuclear tests, including on-site inspection [inspektsiya].

The Soviet Union sees the ending of all nuclear weapons tests as one of the most important elements in shaping the comprehensive international security system whose fundamental basis was formulated by the 27th CPSU Congress. The ideas expressed in the appeal by the leaders of the six countries on universal security without nuclear weapons are very much in accordance with the Soviet concept of creating such an international security sustem. The hope was expressed that the U.S. Government will show political realism, assume a constructive stance, and respond positively to the peoples' demands to end nuclear tests.

The press conference participants replied to numerous questions from journalists.

Question: The proposals on specific questions aimed at ending the arms race contained in the message from the leaders of the "Delhi Six" are linked with the idea of creating a concept of universal security without nuclear weapons. Is there any similarity here with the Soviet approach to the problem of creating a comprehensive international security system?

Answer: The ideas expressed in the message from the leaders of the six countries about universal security without nuclear weapons are very much in accordance with the concept of the creation of a comprehensive international security system set forth in the CPSU Central Committee Political Report to the 27th party congress. Among other aspects uniting our approaches to this problem is the common understanding of the need to end all nuclear weapons tests and eliminate nuclear weapons entirely.

The fundamental basis of this system in the military, political, economic, and humanitarian spheres set forth in the Political Report offers broad scope for productive activity by all governments, parties, and social organizations and movements. It creates a framework for direct, open, and systematic dialogue among the leaders of the countries of the world community. It seems to us that the activity of the authors of the "Delhi Declaration" in this regard is a weighty contribution to the creation of an international security system and we are prepared to continue and develop a useful dialogue with them.

Question: One's attention is drawn to the fact that M.S. Gorbachev's reply also proposes bilateral talks alongside trilateral and multilateral talks on the total prohibition of nuclear tests. Is this seemingly a new element in the USSR's position? Could you explain what is in mind?

Answer: Yes, it is a new element. We are now proposing -- alongside trilateral and multilateral talks, to which we continue to attach great importance -- bilateral Soviet-U.S. talks on questions concerning the problems of the complete ending of nuclear tests. It has been officially proposed to the U.S. side that the talks should start this April in Moscow, Washington, or Geneva. As you can see, we are prepared to hold talks in any form. It is important to get moving on the problem of ending tests. The Soviet Union and the United States can and must set an example in this. We have informed the U.S. side that A.M. Petrosyants, chairman of the USSR State Committee for the Utilization of Atomic Energy, will head the Soviet delegation at the talks.

Question: In advocating the ending of nuclear weapons tests, is not the Soviet Union trying to reinforce its superiority over the United States in the sphere of the creation and improvement of nuclear weapons?

Answer: That could be said if it were not the Soviet Union but the United States that was lagging behind in the sphere of nuclear weapons tests. However, the facts show the opposite. According to figures from the Swedish Defense Research Institute, since 1945 the United States has tested one-third more nuclear devices than the USSR, and 50 percent more if the other Western powers are included.

Question: People in the West, particularly the United States, are voicing doubts about the possibility of verifying [kontrol] the nonconducting of nuclear tests. They say that the Soviet Union, while paying lip service to the importance of verification [kontrol], is actually not prepared to accede to it on Soviet territory. What can you say on that score?

Answer: Both these allegations do not correspond to reality. Our country is no less interested in the reliability and strictness of verification [kontrol] than anyone else. Be it verification [kontrol] using national technical means or international means. As long as it is verification [kontrol] of the observance of specific accords. In short, the USSR is open to verification [kontrol].

But I would like to draw attention to the fact that the entire territory of the Soviet Union is surrounded by stations set up by the United States or under its leadership. They number approximately 200 as against our approximately 20. That is, a 10:1 ratio. The Soviet Union agrees to maintain reciprocal verification [kontrol] even under these conditions. We believe that our 20 stations are sufficient in order to monitor nuclear tests carried out beyond our borders. We have yet to miss any tests. Do 200 U.S. stations with an incredible amount of top-notch equipment really function worse than 20 of our stations? The Americans themselves have written that the system currently in existence in the world is entirely adequate for recording all underground nuclear explosions, even low-level ones.

So the only thing that could prevent verification [kontrol] being organized is the clear reluctance on the U.S. side. Back in 1958 agreed conditions were drawn up whereby the Americans, British, French, and ourselves endorsed [podpisalis v] the possibility of guaranteeing the detection of all nuclear explosions that might take place. And then began a 28-year period of foot-dragging. There is no other description for it.

Replies were also given to journalists' other questions.

Further Report

LD141545 Moscow TASS in English 1536 GMT 14 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow March 14 TASS -- In connection with the unilateral moratorium on nuclear explosions announced by the Soviet side, we have twice named the timeframe for its operations, but a positive response from the USA came in neither case, said Viktor Komplektov, USSR deputy foreign minister. He spoke today in the Press Centre of the USSR Foreign Ministry at a press conference on the question of ending nuclear tests.

Having refrained from explosions for a relatively long time, the Soviet Union has paid a certain price, both militarily and economically. In these conditions, we cannot extend the moratorium indefinitely, without considering the stand of the USA, the deputy minister said.

Therefore, the question of the further destiny of the moratorium now hinges on the USA, on whether the U.S. Administration is capable of showing political will. Meanwhile, our stand is absolutely clear: We wish that there should be no nuclear explosions, that the problem of banning nuclear testing be resolved fully and ultimately.

ARTICLE VIEWS END OF STOCKHOLM CDE SESSION

[Own correspondent M. Kostikov report: "Stockholm: Time Will Not Wait"]

[Text] Stockholm, 14 Mar -- The latest session of the Conference on Confidence and Security Building Measures and Disarmament in Europe is drawing to a close in the Swedish capital. It has taken place in the conditions of an active peace offensive by the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries. The 15 January 1986 statement by M.S. Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, a number of whose provisions are directly relevant to the confidence and among other things to the disentangling of unresolved problems, the CPSU Central Committee Political Report to the 27th CPSU Congress and the idea that it puts forward of creating an all-embracing system of international security -- all this has been at the center of the forum participants' attention. After all, a significant proportion of the new Soviet initiatives relate directly to Europe.

The participants in the Stockholm forum -- that offspring of the all-European process that begin in Helsinki -- are called upon to erect lasting barriers to close every opportunity for the use of force and for covert preparations for war and to ensure the growth of mutual trust. These aims are served by the package of large-scale complementary confidence and security building measures put forward at the conference by the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries.

Among these measures, special significance is attached to the "Basic Principles of a Treaty on the Mutual Nonuse of Military Force and on Maintaining Relations of Peace," submitted by the Soviet delegation. This document focuses attention on the most important thing -- the need to adopt a commitment not to be the first to use either nuclear or conventional arms against each other, and thus not to use military force against each other at all.

Despite the prolonged opposition of the delegations of the United States and a number of its NATO allies, the discussion of this proposal became one of the main components of the Stockholm forum. An important role was played in this by the position of the neutral and nonaligned countries. Their draft document notes, in particular: The states participating in the Helsinki process will refrain in their mutual relations and in international relations in general from use of force -- direct or indirect -- and will adhere strictly and effectively to the principle of nonuse of force as a law of international life. Representatives of certain NATO countries spoke in the same vein, and insisted that the principle should be made more concrete and extended, while the representative of Cyprus, on the instructions of the group of neutral and nonaligned countries, submitted a proposal for the adoption of a declaration of a politically binding nature banning the use of force in any form.

In the course of the Soviet-American summit meeting in Geneva, as is known, the two countries' leaders expressed the intention, together with the other states participating in the Stockholm conference, of promoting its speediest successful completion. As is enshrined in the joint Soviet-American statement, the two sides reaffirmed the need to adopt a document both incorporating mutually acceptable confidence and security building measures and giving concrete form and effectiveness to the principle of the nonuse of force. That is how things were in Geneva. Unfortunately, things are different now in Stockholm. At the conference table, the American delegation is still seeking to avoid the crux of this question. It makes farfetched references to the UN Charter and the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act. Or else it tries to substitute purely military-technical measures for the resolution of this question.

But one thing is no substitute for the other. Military confidence-building measures are directly dependent on and interconnected with political measures, that is, on the adoption of commitments not to use force. In this sphere too major issues are at stake. They include the limitation of the scale of military exercises, preliminary notification of major exercises of ground, naval, and air forces and troop movements and shipments, the inviting of observers, and a number of other measures. The socialist countries' proposals in this sphere take into account to a great extent the position of other states, including the neutral and nonaligned states.

Against the background of the range of large-scale political and military confidence-building measures formulated by the socialist countries' delegations, the NATO package of proposals looks meager and frankly inadequate. It is a question of an extremely narrow approach to military-technical questions and an attempt to secure unilateral advantages, using all kinds of truths and untruths.

Many of the so-called proposals of the United States and the NATO countries are no more than half-measures. Others only create an appearacne. Both are directly contrary, by their nature, to the conference's mandate, which provides for equality of rights, balance and reciprocity, and identical respect for the security interests of all the participating states.

The following fact is noteworthy in the Stockholm forum's work. Throughout its course the socialist countries' proposals have been added to and made more concrete many times. The same is true of the participation of the group of neutral and nonaligned countries. They promoted a rapprochement in the positions of East and West. The NATO package on the other hand, remains unchanged. It is frozen, so to speak, and it really exudes cold. Only the tactics change: From the initial frank rejection of the socialist countries' proposals, the opponents of an agreement are going over to various kinds of procrastination and propaganda tricks.

The failure to resolve the question of notification about major exercises of ground forces, fleets, and air forces is also seriously retarding the attainment of concrete accords at the conference. The USSR has proposed that this problem be resolved, if not comprehensively, then piece by piece. Agreement could be reached now on notifications of major ground and air force exercises. The question of naval activity could be carried over to the next stage of the conference. This practical approach was greeted with satisfaction by the majority of participants.

As for the United States and a number of its allies, their verbal show of "constructiveness" conceals a stubborn reluctance to move at all. There is evidence of a desire to change nothing in their own position, and even to harden it. And to present the Soviet proposals in a false light. Evidence of this is provided by a public statement by R. Barry, head of the U.S. delegation, who not only tried to misrepresent the essence of the USSR's proposals, but also attempted to convince his listeners that the results of the conference will be based wholly on the NATO package.

The conference has now embarked on work to draw up the formulations and individual provisions of the concluding document. This work is taking place in five working groups with the help of coordinators from the neutral and nonaligned countries. Here the U.S. delegation's obstructionist approach is again making itself felt. The coordinator's very first attempt to bring the sides' positions closer together confirmed this. The United States and some of its allies are still not ready seriously to set about resolving the main tasks of the Stockholm conference. This is indicated by the principle of thier participation in the activity of the working groups. Previously, for more than 6 months they were submitting their proposals for examination by the conference piece by piece. Then they stuck them together as some kind of "package" and ceremoniously publicized them as a single document. Now they are cutting it up into pieces again and presenting them for discussion by the working groups, with no changes at all.

All the same, it is possible today to speak of some progress at the conference. The first formulations for possible inclusion in the draft concluding document have been laid down. But these -- it must be said frankly -- relate only to secondary issues and do not touch on the crux of the problems.

...The United States and its NATO allies are dragging out the time in Stockholm. The peoples of Europe cannot agree to such an approach. They expect concrete, large-scale measures from the conference toward confidence and security building and disarmament. Time will not wait. The end of the present stage -- 19 September -- is not far off.

UN LEGAL COUNSEL CALLS U.S. DEMANDS 'UNPRECEDENTED'

[TASS report: "An Arbitrary Position Is Intolerable: Condemnation for the Unprecedented U.S. Act"]

[Text] New York, 14 Mar -- A session of the UN Committee on Relations With the Host Country -- the United States -- was urgently convened at UN headquarters to discuss the hostile new U.S. act regarding permanent missions of the USSR, the Belorussian SSR, and the Ukrainian SSR to the United Nations. The participants condemn Washington's act as a gross violation by the United States of its commitments under the agreement on the UN central agencies and international law and as an attempt to make the activity of the UN states and the organization itself more difficult.

The arbitrary position adopted by the U.S. Administration with regard to the missions of other states accredited to the United Nations is illegal and is directed against the United Nations as a whole and against the rights of all its member states, V.S. Safronchuk, acting permanent representative of the USSR to the United Nations, stated. The U.S. claims to arrogate to itself the right to lay down the numbers of personnel of states' permanent missions to the United Nations as completely impermissible and unacceptable. Nothing in the existing international agreements, among them the 1947 agreement on the UN central agencies, gives the U.S. Government the right to impose numerical restrictions on the personnel of the permanent missions, which are not accredited to the U.S. Government, but to he United Nations. The presence of the United Nations in New York and its rights and privileges are not based on the kindness of the U.S. Administrations, but on an international agreement concluded between the United States and the UN, from which quite clear and definite U.S. commitments arise -- to ensure the necessary conditions for the normal activity of the United Nations and the unhindered participation of the member states in the organization's work.

The provocative U.S. act is not an isolated episode, the Soviet representative went on to say. It reflects the general U.S. approach to the activity of international organizations, an approach which has emerged particularly clearly in recent years. The United States would like to make it unambiguously clear to all countries, first and foremost the small and developing countries, that it intends to adopt repressive measures toward those states and their UN missions if Washington does not like their policy. All this is correctly seen by the international community as a line aimed at undermining the existing system of international organizations and fettering their efforts to develop relations of peace and cooperation among peoples, and as an attempt to place international mechanisms and institutions under U.S. diktat. It therefore cannot be seen as a coincidence that the reaction to this act takes the form of questions being raised about the appropriateness of UN headquarters being located in a country which does not fulfill its commitments to the organization.

The United States claims that it does not want this measure to have an unfavorable effect on joint Soviet-U.S. attempts to consolidate the progress achieved at the meeting held last November between M.S. Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, and U.S. President R. Reagan, the USSR representative said in conclusion. It is deeply regrettable that its practical actions indicate the opposite, and the Soviet side cannot ignore such unlawful U.S. actions and will draw the appropriate conclusions for itself.

Carl-August Fleischauer, UN under secretary general for legal affairs and UN legal adviser, described the U.S. act. He said it was unprecedented in UN history, unilateral, and taken in violation of the agreement on the UN central agencies. Familiarizing the committee with the results of the legal analysis of this act, Fleischauer pointed out that there has been no case in UN practice of the host country trying to establish limits on the numbers or to reduce the numbers of personnel accredited not to its government, but to UN missions. The agreement on the UN central agencies, the legal adviser stressed, makes neither direct nor indirect provision for the renunciation of the principle of collective efforts in the examination of disagreements which occur. The UN secretary general, he noted, has therefore expressed readiness even at this stage to give assistance for the sides to hold such consultations.

The legal adviser's opinion and the appeal of the UN secretary general were supported by practically all who spoke at the session -- the representatives of Bulgaria, Iraq, France, Senegal, the PRC, Spain, and Canada. The hostile and arbitrary U.S. act causes deep concern and indignation among the UN member states, B. Isvetkov, Bulgarian permanent representative to the United Nations, stated. It is a question of an escalation of an unacceptable and extremely dangerous policy of illegal measures aimed at complicating the conditions for the activity of the missions of many sovereign states belonging to the United Nations, including Bulgaria, and an attempt to undermine the effectiveness and prestige of the United Nations.

The U.S. representative made a groundless attempt to extricate himself and justify the illegal act, which has aroused a storm of indignation at the United Nations. He referred with cynical scorn to the United Nations and to the decisions and resolutions adopted by that major international organizations, speaking of them as "pieces of paper."

The committee will continue its discussion of the flagrantly arbitrary and illegal U.S. act.

CPSU CONGRESS FOREIGN POLICY APPEAL VIEWED

PM131611 Moscow SOVETSKAYA ROSSIYA in Russian 11 Mar 86 First Edition p 1

[Editorial: "Peace Strategy"]

[Text] For 10 days in February and March the attention of the entire world was riveted on Moscow and the Kremlin Palace of Congresses. There was no corner of the globe where people -- some with hope, others with poorly concealed irritation -- did not listen to the voices of Moscow. Of course, those whose sympathies lie with the ideals and thoughts expressed at the Soviet Communists' congress are by far in the majority. And this is natural. Mankind has fittingly appraised the world significance of the 27th CPSU Congress, calling it an event of historic proportions. Now, when the contemporary world has reached a sudden turning point, all Soviet people and millions of the world's inhabitants welcomed with profound satisfaction the honest, realistic, humane, and comprehensively considered program of action adopted by the congress.

How can we save civilization and preserve life on earth? How can we neutralize the threat emanating from imperialism? How can we stop the world from sliding into the nuclear abyss? How can we keep space unsullied?

Sensible ideas on these difficult problems, clear, intelligent proposals, and a great sense of responsibility have aroused people's fervent approval and gratitude -- people living on all the earth's continents. People the world over wholeheartedly welcomed the strong, impassioned, and very sincere appeal for peace made at the Soviet Communists' forum.

The existence of two socioeconomic systems is a reality of our era. It is clear to all sober-minded people in the world that this reality cannot be ignored. It is also clear that our enemies' view of socialism as a "historical error" has in no way been able to halt the ongoing progress of social development. A policy of total antagonism and military confrontation, as was firmly stressed in the CPSU Central Committee Political Report to the party congress, has no future. We threaten no one, but we will not renounce our principles and ideals one iota either. With regard to the mythical communist threat, today it is clear even to the most naive person that this myth has been created to justify imperialism's aggressiveness. Fewer and fewer people believe this decrepit myth -- on the contrary, a large section of mankind pins its hopes of life without war on the Soviet Union's consistent struggle against the nuclear danger hanging over the world.

Thorough analysis of the most important group of contradictions connected with relations between states with different systems, as of all the other contradictions of this alarming phase in our history, provides a clear picture of the reality of the contemporary era and of ways of avoiding crisis situations. And this analysis made at the congress will, without doubt, help millions of people on earth to understand the essence of historical development processes.

Will the ruling centers of capital be able to embark on the path of sober, constructive evaluation of events? The peoples await an answer to this question. "We cannot accept 'no' as the answer to the following question: Is mankind to be or not to be?" M.S. Gorbachev said in the CPSU Central Committee Political Report. "We say: social progress and the existence of civilization must and will continue."

The optimism and realism characteristic of communists determine our entire strategy -- a strategy of defending peace and eliminating the threat of war. Its main aim is totally clear -- to guarantee the Soviet people the possibility of working in conditions of peace and freedom. Fulfilling this program demand on our foreign policy primarily means stopping material preparation for nuclear war.

"The USSR's proposal to implement a program to free mankind from nuclear weapons by the year 2000 is not simply a very bold step: It is feasible, if it becomes the vital cause of peace-loving forces throughout the world." These words were spoken from the congress rostrum by Jorgen Jensen, chairman of the Communist Party of Denmark.

Yes, the time has come for strenuous action. The impassioned appeal for peace heard from Moscow is being backed up and supported in all four corners of the earth. Psychological reorientation is necessary in order to comprehend the call for action. Even those who still console themselves with illusions and the hope that everything will somehow sort itself out are beginning to understand the realities of our world -- a world too fragile for policies of strength. Saving the world and mankind is impossible without making a final break with the type of ideas and actions which have formed over the centuries on the basis of the permissibility of war. This is one of the most important conclusions drawn by the 27th CPSU Congress.

Almost 2 months have passed since that January day when the teletypes in Moscow sent out the text of the statement by M.S. Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee. For the first time a program of specific, tangible actions, strictly calculated in terms of time, was formulated. Ardent support for the Soviet peace program -- a program that has met with the fervent approval of millions of people throughout the world -- came across again and again from the congress rostrum, in the speeches of the delegates and guests.

The guests spoke on behalf of their parties and peoples, who had authorized them to say 'yes' in Moscow, a city where the appeal for peace has rung out powerfully and passionately; 'Yes', the elimination of nuclear weapons is the most urgent problem today. Now it is up to the United States.

The "linkages," "conditions," and various reservations of Western politicians, who are virtually blocking any solution to vital disarmament issues, rightly arouse people's anger. Of the streams of letters sent to the editor during the congress, letters fervently in support of our party's foreign policy strategy, we will cite two: from women living at different ends of Europe.

"My father was killed at Leningrad in 1943," T. Yakusheva, from the Bashkir city of Sterlitamak, writes. "I know my mother's grief. It is beyond measure. At the age of 24, my mother was left alone with young children. We lost 12 relatives in the last war. And I do not want the tragedy to be repeated. That is why I vote for M.S. Gorbachev's 15 January statement and for the congress decisions. And I want my voice to be heard by all mothers of the world."

Here is the second letter: "My relatives died in Lidice, a mining settlement which the fascists razed to the ground. I know how many other Lidices there were across your country. And I bow to the victims of misanthropy, barbarity, and aggression. More than 4 decades have passed since those tragic days. How many lives have been taken over these years by new wars and conflicts! In the fifties in Korea; in the seventies in Vietnam. Today in southern Africa, the Middle East, and Latin America. People are dying as a result of conflicts which benefit only those who are afraid of losing their profits. It is they who think up various conditions and tricks. I am grateful to your party for its sense of responsibility, its humanism, and the determination with which you are saving peace."

This letter was written by a Czech woman, Gusta Karelova, living in central Europe.

Europe's chance in history and its future, it was noted at the congress, lie in peaceful cooperation between the states of the old continent. Our movement toward mature detente and toward creating reliable security on the basis of Helsinki process and a radical reduction in nuclear and conventional weapons is in Europeans' vital interests.

Our foreign policy, which is a continuation of our domestic policy, demonstrates the vast potential of peace, reason, and goodwill. The presence of party leaders from the fraternal socialist countries at the congress; their speeches in the Kremlin Palace of Congresses; their cordial meetings with our country's working people; their friendly talks with M.S. Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee; and their appraisals and thoughts expressed during meetings, talks, and speeches on their return to their homelands attest to our increasingly strong comradeship and to our desire to share experience, take mutual advantage of our friends' good advice, and make our cooperation closer. To make skillful use of all that is best and progressive and at the disposal of our states and peoples means bringing into play vast additional capital which will be of perceptible benefit and strengthen the economic might of the entire socialist community. The store of fresh, interesting ideas is open to friends, and not only in the economic sphere. Cooperation has taken strong hold of every sphere in the fraternal countries, every level of their social structures, and acquired a truly national nature.

Yes, today, as stressed in the 27th congress resolution on the CPSU Central Committee Political Report, the fate of peace and social progress are more closely connected than eve before with the dynamism of the world socialist system's economic and political development. The congress considered adoption of the Integrated Program for the CEMA Countries' Scientific and Technical Progress to be a matter of particular significance. An innovative, enterprising approach to the problems of socialist economic integration is becoming a decisive factor in the work of the CEMA countries.

The Soviet Communists' congress favored a comradely exchange of opinions and honest, open relations with all states in the world socialist system. "The party strives for stable, comradely relations and multilateral cooperation between the USSR and all states in the world socialist system." So it is recorded in the CPSU Program.

Our party welcomes every step along the path of bringing socialist states closer together and every positive change in relations between them. The congress noted with satisfaction certain improvements in relations with our country's great neighbor -- socialist China.

The communist movement is diverse. But its diversity is not a synonym for dislocation. While confirming our aspiration to unity among the world's communists, we stress the principle of noninterference by some parties in the affairs of others.

The Central Committee Political Report puts forth the principled foundations for forming an all-embracing international security system. On behalf of the CPSU, the congress appealed to governments, parties, social organizations and movements concerned with the fate of peace and to all peoples. The 27th CPSU Congress called for cooperation in the great battle against war.

Days pass, months and years rush swiftly by, making an event that we have recently experienced a part of history. But, every day after the closing of the congress, the world will be able to feel the pulse of goodwill emanating from Moscow.

The foreign press continues to publish numerous commentaries and editorials evaluating the impact of the congress ideas on the course of world events. "We rely on historical experience and on collaboration with the great Soviet country," Bulgaria's RABOTNICHESKO DELO writes editorially.

The great interest in our congress and its decisions shown by the broad masses of the world public forces even many bourgeois information media to give an objective appraisal of the Soviet Communist forum. Britain's THE OBSERVER, for example, notes: "There is no reason to doubt the frankness of M.S. Gorbachev's proposals or his sincere desire to cast off not only the burden of 'star wars' but also the burden of the arms race in general. To understand this it is sufficient to just take a look at the gigantic scale of the socioeconomic changes which the Soviet leader proposed to the congress." The 27th CPSU Congress adopted decisions oriented toward the future. It confirmed the prospect, outlined by the Soviet Union, of mankind freed from nuclear weapons. There is only one truth. And this truth, our humanism, and the appeal for reason and action heard in Moscow will, without doubt, reach every inhabitant of our planet.

IZVESTIYA ON 'HISTORIC' USSR INTERNATIONAL GOALS

[Editorial: "The 27th CPSU Congress on the USSR's Foreign Policy"]

[Text] History consists not only of the past but also of the future. Is that not what the expression the "makers of history" means? The makers of history are the creators of the future. The 27th CPSU Congress was historic primarily because it was conducted by a party which has its sights set on the future and is fully determined to make that future peaceful. Progress in the 20th century is correctly connected with socialism. World socialism is a mighty international formation. Its ideal is a world without wars or weapons. Socialism has transformed that world, considered to be a utopia for thousands of years, into a realistically attainable goal.

The mere fact that the goal is attainable does not mean that it will be easy. Particularly in present-day conditions, when imperialism represents a growing threat to mankind's very existence. Militarism is imperialism's most grotesque progeny. Imperialism, which was first to use nuclear weapons, is preparing now to take a new and possibly irreversible step -- that of transferring the arms race into space or, in other words, training its sights on the whole planet.

The qualitatively new scale and character of the threat facing mankind have set it incredibly difficult problems. The vital and urgent requirement authoritatively dictates the need for a new understanding of the conditions that have been created and a new kind of thinking. The 27th CPSU Congress provides the most vivid example of that kind of thinking. The analysis on that basis of the character and scale of the nuclear threat has enabled our party to formulate a conclusion of great theoretical and practical importance; namely, that in the international arena objective conditions have taken shape in which the confrontation between captialism and socialism can take place solely and exclusively in the forms of peaceful competition and peaceful rivalry.

On that basis, the congress instructed the Central Committee to work consistently, systematically, and persistently for the resolution of international security problems, directing the Soviet Union's foreign policy toward the strict pursuit of the course of peaceful coexistence, firmness in defense of our principles and positions tactical flexibiltiy, readiness for mutually acceptable compromises, and orientation toward dialogue and mutual understanding. The congress stressed the need for the further activation of Soviet foreign policy in all spheres, the search for a just and peaceful settlement of the causes of tension, and the development of good-neighborly mutuallybeneficial relations with all states.

One of the world press' many reactions to the 27th CPSU Congress expressed deep respect and even admiration for the way in which "Soviet Communists are able to keep their ear to the ground and hear the footsteps of history." Yes, our finger is on the pulse of history. Yes, we keep our ear fixed to the planet's heart. Yes, we hear and understand its beat. Furthermore, we are doing everything in our power to make that heartbeat calm and steady.

The principled "Basic Principles for the Creation of an All-Embracing System of International Security" put forward in the CentralCommittee's Political Report is the translation into the language of political realities of mankind's instinct for self-preservation. Using these basic principles as a guide, it would be possible to turn peaceful coexistence into the supreme universal principle of international relations. Our party, the party of Lenin and the future, the party of Lenin and peace, addressed an appeal from the lofty congress platform to all governments, parties, and social organizations and movements really concerned about the fate of peace on earth. Our party appealed to all the peoples inhabiting the world to cooperate more closely and productively to achieve success in the battle against war, success which will be a historic victory for all mankind and for each person on our planet.

The lofty moral and spiritual tone of the CPSU's activity was also fully manifested in the congress' international aspects. The resolution adopted by the congress on the CPSU Central Committee's Political Report says that "the main goal of the CPSU's foreign policy strategy is to provide the Soviet people with the opportunity to work in conditions of lasting peace and freedom. For that reason the struggle against the nuclear danger and the arms race and for the preservation and strengthening of universal peace must continue in the future to be the main direction of the party's activity in the international arena."

The congress proclaimed that the central direction of the Soviet Union's foreign policy for the years ahead is to be the struggle to implement the program put forward in the CPSU Central Committee general secretary's 15 January 1986 statement for destroying weapons of mass extermination and averting the danger of war. The implementation of this program of historic scale and significance would offer mankind a fundamentally different direction of development and an opportunity to concentrate solely on creation.

There is no alternative to this policy. The character of modern weapons allows no state the hope of defending itself solely by military-technical means. Not one state. The continuation of the arms race on earth, and in particular its extension into space, would accelerate the already critically high pace of the stockpiling and improvement of nuclear and other types of weapons, with the result that even parity would cease to be a factor for military-political deterrence. Yes, it is time to give relations among states a foundation more durable than weapons. Those people who want to progress into the future cannot and must not sit on the nuclear powder keg.

Identical security is the obligatory command of the times. The Soviet Union, whose military doctrine is solely defensive in nature, is the most convinced opponent of nuclear war in any form. Our country advocates that all types of weapons of mass destruction be removed from use and that military potentials be limited to the bounds of reasonable adequacy. But the character and level of that limit continue to be determined by the positions and actions of the United States and its bloc partners. But as the congress resolutely and unambiguously stressed, the Soviet Union does not lay claim to greater security but nor will it accept diminished security.

The preconditions for improving the international situation which have begun to take shape recently do not yet in themselves represent a turning point. The arms race continues. The threat of nuclear war remains. There are still those in the international community who lay claim to a special form of security adapted to their needs alone. Washington's attitude demonstrates that fact. People there still appeal to strength, which continues to be seen as the most convincing argument in world politics. Clearly, some people on the Potomac are simply afraid of the opportunity that has materialized for a serious, long-term thaw in Soviet-U.S. relations and in the international atmosphere as a whole.

The situation is not new. The forces of militarism and aggression even now would prefer the perpetuation of confrontation. "But what else can we do, comrades? Slam the door shut?" M.S. Gorbachev said in his speech at the congress' closing session. "It is not out of the question that this is what we are being pushed into doing. But we are perfectly well aware of our responsibility for the fate of the country, the fate of peace. And for that reason, we do not intend to play into the hands of those who want to accustom mankind to the nuclear threat and the arms race."

Not to slam the door shut to peace talks but to firmly lock the door leading to war -- that is our task and our duty. International reaction is powerful, but not all-powerful. The development of the world revolutionary process and the rise of mass democratic and antiwar movements have considerably expanded and intensified the vast potential for peace, reason, and good will which serves as a powerful counterbalance to imperialism's aggressive policy.

Now the fate of peace and social progress are more closely linked than ever with the dynamism of the world socialist system's economic and political development. The congress expressed its unwavering belief in socialism's ability to resolve the most complex tasks and noted the increasingly active cooperation among the socialist countries, which promotes the acceleration of common progress.

Yes, socialism and peace, peace and creation are indissoluble. Socialism would not be fulfilling its historic mission if it did not spearhead the struggle to rid mankind of the burden of war alerts and violence. Security and a just peace for all peoples are Soviet foreign policy's main goal.

In the acute and dynamic confrontation between progress and reaction, the trend toward a change in the correlation of forces in the international arena in favor of peace is gaining ground. This trend is stable and in principle irreversible. The 27th CPSU Congress not only demonstrated this trend but also give it a powerful new impetus. The call for peace which resounded from the Kremlin's Palace of Congresses and the path to peace outlined by our party's supreme forum found unanimous support among the Soviet people. They were received with sympathy by all peace-loving mankind. They contain hope and the future belongs to them.

BELORUSSIA, UKRAINE CIRCULATE PROTEST NOTES AT UN

PRO-U.S. REGIMES SAID TO BE 'COLLAPSING'

LD142327 Moscow Television Service in Russian 1545 GMT 14 Mar 86

[Report from "The World Today" program presented by Aleksandr Zholkver]

[Text] Again and again, one's attention is drawn to the activities of profascist, militarist forces in a number of Western Europe countries. These forces were quite active during the tumultuous campaign in Spain before the referendum just held regarding its NATO membership. Now, more and more reports are coming in about the kinds of methods -- including crude pressure and direct blackmail -- which were used by representatives of the United States and other NATO countries, especially the FRG, to try and secure Spain's remaining in the Atlantic military bloc.

It is noteworthy that immediately after the referendum, British Lord Carrington, NATO's secretary general, expressed disatisfaction at a press conference over the fact that the Spanish Government has nonetheless not agreed to fully include its armed forces in the bloc's military organization. Carrington immediately let it be known that with regard to Spain, the NATO leadership intends to operate with the same methods as, for example, in relation to Norway. This country, as is known, has also hedged around its NATO membership with certain conditions, in particular the nondeployment of atomic weapons on its territory. Practice shows, however, that the NATO command is drawing Norway deeper and deeper into its military plans. Major winter NATO maneuvers have just been held here. During these exercises, 16 Norwegian soldiers died tragically in an avalanche.

May I remind you that the United States uses not only the NATO countries, but also many other countries as bridgeheads for the deployment and military training of its troops. For example, major exercises of all U.S. Armed Forces are being held now in South Korea and off its coast. In this connection, observers point to the similarity between the situations in South Korea and the Philippines. In both places the main factor determining Washington's policy toward these states is the presence on their territories of major U.S. military bases.

This fact to no small degree contributes to the activization of anti-U.S. protests in these countries. In order to cool them down, Washington, as is known, recently resorted to changing the government in the Philippines. Now many people are wondering: What will happen in South Korea, where protests are growing both against the U.S. placeman, the dictator Chon Tu-hwan, and in general against the pro-U.S. course of the Seoul regime. The U.S. magazine, NEWSWEEK gloomily admits: It did not take long for the waves of change to roll from the Philippines to the shores of another Asian country with a totalitarian regime. Yes, pro-U.S. dictatorial regimes evidently are collapsing all over the world, from the Philippines and South Korea to Haiti and El Salvador.

WEST CALLS CRIMINALS 'CHAMPION OF HUMAN RIGHTS'

LD142302 Moscow TASS in English 2243 GMT 14 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow March 14 TASS -- TASS political news analyst Boris Chekhonin writes: It is not surprising when such radio stations as the "Liberty" and "Free Europe" try to pass off criminal offenders as "champions of human rights". It is too obvious who inspires their broadcasts. But one cannot but be surprised when the French LE MONDE with its claims to objective reporting, or even official Washington attempt to do the same.

Take the latest example, a special message of the head of the U.S. Administration read out late last January at a reception held by Americans of the Ukrainian origin in Washington. The message says that such champions of human rights in the Ukraine as Josif Terelya have to serve lengthy terms of prison merely for the fact that they proclaim their faith and the fundamental principles of freedom and democracy.

So, according to the head of the White House, Josif Terelya is absolutely innocent. But what about the real character of that "advocate of religious freedoms and democracies"? The records of the investigation and trials stood by Josif Terelya make up nine bulky files and make nauseous reading.

Josif Terelya was first imprisoned early in the early sixties along with his brother Boris. And he landed in prison not at all for the struggle to defend human rights. Quite the oppposite, for infringing on those rights and for encroaching on private property. Having stolen firearms, the brothers staged a series of armed robberies for which they were condemned. Dwellers of the Ukrainian town of Svalyava -- Yemelyan Shtern, Geogiy Gsteletskiy, and Maria Rusin, became victims of the criminals at that time. This information can be checked with the victims even now. The testimonies of the victims feature also in the recordings of Josif Terelya's criminal case. By the way, Josif's brother, Boris Terelya, having committed subsequently a number of new crimes and killed Ya. Kuzma, a resident of the Transcarpathian region, put up armed resistance when being detained in 1982 and was killed in a shootout with militiamen.

From 1963 to 1983, Josif Terelya, whom the West now presents as a champion of human rights, committed a number of criminal offenses and was brought to court. And he was tried for crimes, not for faith or protecting human rights. After serving time, he shirked socially useful work persistently.

Having realised that the lot of a robber and thief holds out little promise, Josif Terelya decided to assume the role of a religious man and protector of the right of believers, even though he admitted to his friends that he has no faith in God. The latter-day preacher set about concocting slanderous materials and passing them on to the West. It is for this that the inveterate criminal was sentenced to the deprivation of freedom in August 1985.

Thus, Terelya, a robber and parasite, became a slanderer of his native country and his people. And this man is declared in the West almost as a saint of the so-called Ukrainian Uniate Church, which, by the way, dissolved itself in the Soviet Union way back in 1946 for the reason that its leadership had compromised itself by collaboration with fascist invaders during World War Two.

UN HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION SESSION ENDS

PM161825 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 16 Mar 86 First Edition p 5

[TASS report: "Stop the Encroachments: UN Human Rights Commission Session Ends"]

[Text] Geneva, 15 Mar -- The 42d session of the UN Human Rights Commission has ended here after demonstrating convincingly that the world community resolutely condemns the flagrant, mass violations of human rights and basic freedoms by the reactionary regimes in southern Africa and Central and South America, and by Israel in the occupied Arab territories.

The participants in the session representing the socialist countries and many of the developing countries noted frankly that these human rights violations are the result of the policy of the forces of imperialism and reaction, which interfere brazenly in the internal affairs of sovereign states and wage undeclared wars against the DRA, revolutionary Nicaragua, Angola, and Cambodia.

The resolutions adopted by the session severely censure the policy pursued by the reactionary regimes of Chile, El Salvador, Paraguay, and certain other countries where violations of human rights and basic freedoms, far from stopping, have actually increased recently.

The commission reaffirmed the peoples' right to self-determination and came out against interference in the internal affairs of independent states and against flagrant encroachments on human rights.

The work of this session took place in the midst of the somewhat acute struggle caused by the desire of the United States and a number of its allies in the aggressive NATO bloc to use it as a platform for organizing a provocative slander campaign against Afghanistan, Cambodia, Ethiopia, and certain other countries.

The constructive progress of the session was promoted largely by the active, assertive position of the delegations of the socialist countries and many developing countries, which made joint efforts in defense of human rights and the cause of peace and exposed the intrigues of the United States and other Western countries.

SOVIET UN ASSOCIATION BOARD ELECTS CHAIRMAN

PM131655 Moscow IZVESTIYA in Russian 13 Mar 86 Morning Edition p 5

[TASS report: "Session Held"]

[Text] A session of the Soviet UN Association Board was held in Moscow 11 March. Tasks concerned with the association's activity in 1986-1987 were examined and questions involving its participation in the movement in support of the United Nations in International Year of Peace were discussed. The session participants spoke of the great significance of the provisions of the CPSU Central Committee's Political Report to the 27th party congress, which are aimed at creating an all-embracing international security system, removing the nuclear threat, ending the arms race, and preserving and consolidating world peace on the basis of peaceful coexistence among states with different sociopolitical systems. Note was taken of the importance of mobilizing broad sections of the world public in support of the program to eliminate nuclear weapons by the year 2000 expounded in M.S. Gorbachev's statement.

The board elected Academician G.A. Arbatov chairman of the Soviet UN Association Board.

TASS COMMENTS ON REAGAN'S TELEVISION ADDRESS

LD170835 Moscow TASS in English 0830 GMT 17 Mar 86

["Anti-Nicaraguan Statement by American President" -- TASS item identifier]

[Text] Washington March 17 TASS -- By TASS correspondent Nikolay Turkatenko.

U.S. President Ronald Reagan in his televised speech has resorted to slander and concoctions with a view to pressing Congress into allocating 100 million dollars in military aid to the Somocistas whom he described as "freedom-fighters."

The President's speech was reminiscent of the script of the controversial anti-communist film "Red Dawn." The cheap movie, shot on money of reactionaries, describes an "invasion of the United States" by Nicaraguan, Cuban and Soviet Armed Forces via Mexican territory. Reagan described a similar situation. Intimidating the American legislators and general public, the President claimed that Nicaragua, situated thousands of kilometers from the United States, threatens the national security of the Unites States and is becoming a "mortal threat ot the entire new world."

Nicaragua, he alleged, jointly with the Soviet Union and Cuba, is planning to "become the dominant power in the crucial corridor between North and South America," wants to threaten the Panama Canal, "interdict our vital Caribbean sea lanes" and then "move against Mexico."

Demanding that congressmen realize their historic responsibility and immediately allocate 100 million dollars in military aid to the "contras," Reagan blamed Nicaragua yet one more time for rampant terrorism in Central America.

The President assured viewers that the United States has no plans to use its Armed Forces against Nicaragua. It allegedly seeks a "peaceful settlement." Local observers noticed, however, that Reagan not only demanded increased aid to the "contras," but also called for the prevention of "a communist takeover of Central America." He asserted that a deep water port and the "largest military air field in Central America" are being built in Nicaragua. Indicatively, the President resorted to the same "line of argument" prior to the U.S. invasion of Grenada.

The Nicaraguan Embassy in Washington has distributed a statement describing the U.S. President's speech as a sleazy trick with a view to enlisting support for direct armed interference by the United States in Nicaragua, to provoking a bloody war throughout Central America.

Reagan's statement has been criticized by several American congressmen. Senator Jim Sasser (Democrat, Tennessee) said that the president obviously prefers military solutions. Thomas O'Neill, leader of the Democratic majority in the House of Representatives, demanded peace initiatives, rather than kindling of the conflict.

The U.S. NEWS AND WORLD REPORT points out that the White House's militarist course with regard to Nicaragua generates extensive discontent and alarm both in the United States and throughout Latin America. THE WASHINGTON POST newspaper stresses that the Americans are concerned over the prospects of U.S. involvement in a Central American war,and the constant growth of military spending in general and increased allocations for the "contras," in particular at a time when American citizens are told to tighten their belts.

Congressional voting on the administration's request for 100 million dollars in military aid to the "contras" is slated for this week. Leading congressmen from the two parties predict a keen struggle not only around the sum but also around Washington's dangerous militarist course in Central America.

REGAN CITED ON AIM TO 'TOPPLE' SANDINIST REGIME

LD160648 Moscow TASS in English 0644 GMT 17 Mar 86

[Text] New York March 17 TASS -- The Reagan administration aims to topple the Nicaraguan Government by using counter-revolutionary gangs as a proxy, White House Chief of Staff Donald Regan said bluntly on NBC television.

He accused the Sandinist government of being "aggressive" and said, "We must get rid of it in some way or another." "What we want to do," Regan explained, "is to try to help those who are trying to overthrow" the Nicaraguan Government and "allow that nation to have the leaders that they should have." In other words, the leaders that would suit the United States.

He said the U.S. Administration was "going all out" to secure congressional approval for 100 million dollars in military aid to the "contras" and that it would not make any compromises on the issue.

Regan made no bones about admitting that Washington was seeking the same results in Nicaragua as it had brought about in Grenada, whose independence and sovereignty have been crushed by a U.S. invasion force. He confirmed at the same time that the U.S. Administration did not have any intention to "destabilize" or "topple" the Pinochet regime in Chile.

WHITE HOUSE SEEKS CONTRA AID 'AT ALL COSTS'

PM140931 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 13 Mar 86 First Edition p 5

[Own correspondent V. Gan dispatch: "Campaigning for the Right To Commit Piracy"]

[Text] Washington, 12 Mar -- The American capital has been overwhelmed by a most acute political confrontation between the White House and the U.S. Congress. The discord centers on the Reagan administration's intention to persuade the legislators at all costs to allocate $100 million for military and economic aid to Nicaraguan "contras."

The opposition to the President's request on Capitol Hill is of a bipartisan nature -- which in itself is a pretty rare phenomenon. Making a quite realistic assessment of the situation in Central America, senators and members of the House of Representatives voice open concern at Washington's interventionist policy of seeking to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government. Fears are being voiced with increasing frequency on the banks of the Potomac that support for terrorists trained and controlled by the CIA will inevitably lead to direct American armed interference. As the CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR writes in this connection, "many people in Congress regard aid for the 'contras' not as an alternative to sending U.S. troops but as a magnet that will one day certainly draw American Armed Forces into the conflict." On a wave of such sentiments a number of House committees have already rejected the administration's claim.

The President and his entourage, however, are continuing stubbornly to pursue their policy of stepping up interference in the affairs of Sandino's country. A single-minded campaign is being conducted to "twist the arms" of the legislators -- a campaign headed by the master of the White House. Republican leaders are constantly being "carpeted" at his residence; the President personally telephones "undecided" senators and members of the House of Representatives.

At the same time, displaying an obvious lack of imagination, administration spokesman can find nothing better to do than to intimidate Congress, and the whole country along with it, with the specter of the fabricated "communist threat." Everything is employed -- anti-Soviet fabrications, slander, and all kinds of falsehoods. P. Buchanan, White House director of communications, has gone so far as to publicly badger opponents of aid to the "contras," ascribing "communist sympathies" to them. He declared in a CBS TV interview, for example, that "a vote against the President is equivalent to a vote for communism."

Senators P. Leahy, T. Harkin, P. Simon, M. Hatfield, C. Dodd, L. Weicker dealt a resolute rebuff to the unseemly attacks and blackmail at a press conference held today. Sharply condemning the administration's McCarthyite methods, they pointed out that White House policy with regard to Nicaragua is pushing the United States onto the slippery and dangerous path of direct aggression. Calling the "contras" a gang of "rebels headed by Somocista guardsmen, mercenaries, and adventurers," Senator P. Leahy declared that growing U.S. interference threatens to turn all of Central America into a battlefield on which, sooner or later, American boys will be sent to die.

The legislators' sensible arguments and the appeals to abandon the shameful course are arrogantly ignored by the administration. Speaking at a meeting with a group of journalists, President Reagan categorically ruled out any possibility of a "compromise" with Congress. The president claimed that Americans "did not understand" the White House policy, which he intends to "explain" in his speech on national television next Sunday.

All this means that in the days remaining until the decisive vote in the House of Representatives scheduled for 19 March the administration will throw all possible and impossible levers to exert pressure and push through its request. Although it is hard to predict the final outcome of the clash, it is clear that the White House has already demonstrated adequately that it is not the least interested in seeking a peaceful solution to the conflict in Central America either by way of bilateral talks with Nicaragua or with the Contadora Group's help. On the Potomac they advocate state terrorism and the right to commit international piracy.

'DISINFORMATION' SEEN IN CONTRA AID CAMPAIGN

LD151456 Moscow Domestic Service in Russian 1030 GMT 15 Mar 86

[Vyacheslav Lavrentyev commentary]

[Text] The U.S. Government has unleashed a massive campaign of disinformation and intimidation in its attempt by hook or by crook to persuade Congress to allocate $100 million to the Nicaraguan contras. At the microphone is commentator Vyacheslav Lavrentyev:

I would remind you that last year the administration had great difficulty in persuading Congress to allocate $26 million to the Nicaraguan counterrevolutionaries that Washington is using to wage war against the Sandinist government.

This money did not lead to victory for counterrevolution. It brought only new suffering for the people of Nicaragua. Now this year Reagan is asking the legislators to shell out four times as much.

In the past year some congressmen have become convinced that this aid will not save the contras from ultimate defeat and others that the Somozist cutthroats have nothing at all in common with fighters for freedom and democracy as the U.S. Administration tries to present them. Thus, the presidential request this time has come up against unusually strong opposition. The vote in the Congress is to be held on 19 March and the administration is now pulling out all the stops to correct the situation currently unfavorable to it.

Shuttle emissary Philip Habib, who has been appointed the President's special envoy to Central America, has hurriedly visited El Salvador, Honduras, and Guatemala. A large group of congressmen is now flying to Central America in order to bring to Washington by Wednesday heart-rending stories about the calamitous position of the contras that will help the administration win over intractable congressmen. At the same time, THE WASHINGTON POST writes, the administration resorting to extensive attempts to discredit authoritative research that depicts the brutalities and human rights violations by the Nicaraguan counterrevolutionaries. That is, the White House is doing everything it can to wring out the money to continue its aggressive course in Central America. Buchanan, White House director of communications, even went so far as to say quite bluntly: Voting against aid to the contras is the same as voting for the communists. In reply to this Senator Hatfield noted that there was a time when opposition to the Vietnam war was equated with a lack of patriotism.

An investigation produced evidence fully implicating the staff member of the U.S. Embassy in intelligence-gathering activities incompatible with his official status. For his unlawful spying activities Sellers was declared persona non-grata.

An investigation is under way in the case of the arrested agent of U.S. intelligence.

ARTICLE CONSIDERS ROLE OF '208 COMMITTEE'

PM161449 Moscow IZVESTIYA in Russian 11 Mar 86 Morning Edition p 4

[Report by own correspondent A. Palladin: "Behind the Sabotage Scenes": "What Is the '208 Committee' Up To?"]

[Text] Washington -- A group of local officials regularly meets in a building adjoining the White House. The group is named for the room in which it meets -- the "208 Committee."

The ideas and recommendations elaborated by the committee are submitted for approval by the White House chief, whose signature gives U.S. special services the "right" to interfere in the lives of millions of people living on the other side of the world. A flourish of the President's pen brings them terror, plots, sabotage, and often, death.

The "208 Committee," whose existence and functions were revealed by THE WASHINGTON POST, is the brainchild of the R. Reagan administration. Set up on the lines of the "40 Committee" (an interagency body in charge of covert operations under Nixon), the committee's roots go back to the immediate postwar years when Washington took on board the doctrine of "rolling back communism." Now, THE WASHINGTON POST writes, the White House is trying to achieve the same aim, using the old slogans of freedom and democracy as camouflage. Not for nothing is CIA Director William Casey enjoying unprecedented influence in the U.S. Government at the moment. His role -- and I quote THE WASHINGTON POST again -- is comparable only to that of Allen Dulles, who was boss of the "cloak and dagger knights" 30 years ago.

The "Reagan doctrine," to use White House propaganda chief Patrick Buchanan's term for the revived policy of the past, is geared to suppressing national liberation movements and stifling victorious revolutions. In other words, the present U.S. Administration is striving to "cure" the developing states of the "virus of independence" by means of the therapy that was used in the case of Grenada.

The White House and its chief, THE WASHINGTON POST stresses, are absolutely obsessed with the idea of "rolling back communism." The other day the U.S. President graphically demonstrated this by appearing before the press in a shirt bearing the inscription "Stop Communism in Central America." Reagan's crusade against the forces of progress and genuine democracy constitutes the essence of his administration's foreign policy. That is why, THE WASHINGTON POST observes, the CIA's annual budget is now higher than at any time since the "dirty war" against the peoples of Indochina, and the chief of this espionage and sabotage department, Casey, has been given practically unlimited scope to satisfy "his well-known passion for covert operations."

And the White House chief is known for, among other things, his passion for Hollywood, whose images and snappy expressions he often borrows when describing real events. A month ago, when he was delivering the "State of the Union" message, he commented on his policy using the name of the popular movie "Back to the Future." But the facts provide irrefutable evidence that the "Reagan doctrine" leads forward ... into the past.

[The report is accompanied by the following information printed in boldface in a separate box: The members of the "208 Committee" include Donald Fortier, the President's deputy national security affairs adviser; Clair George, head of the CIA's secret operations department; Michael Armacost, under secretary of state; Fred Ikle, under secretary of defense, and Morton Abramowitz, director of the Bureau of Intelligence and Research at the State Department.]

POSNER RECALLS ROW OVER APPEARANCE ON ABC

LD151556 Moscow Television Service in Russian 1610 GMT 14 Mar 86

[Vladimir Posner commentary from the "World and Youth" program]

[Text] During the proceedings of the congress, I was accredited to the press center of the congress, and I met a lot with fellow journalists from different countries, including U.S. journalists.

I must say that they were very interested in the congress, but they were particularly interested in the part of the Political Report of the Central Committee dealing with the Soviet Union's foreign policy and the Soviet Union's proposals aimed at ridding the world of nuclear weapons by the year 2000. In the context of this report and this proposal, the U.S. ABC television corporation invited me to listen to, and then on American television to comment on, president Reagan's speech to the nation in which he called for an increase in this year's defense budget.

I naturally accpeted the invitation. And I must say plainly that I voiced a certain amount of disagreement with a number of points in this speech, which, in my view, was geared only to the arms race and not at all to disarmament, let alone to seeing that by the year 2000 we will be able to live without the fear of nuclear annihilation. You would have thought everything was fine: A Soviet person had expressed his views, and that is in actual fact what ABC had wanted. But it only seemed that way. A storm erupted in America. The U.S. President spoke up quite sharply against the Soviet journalist's appearance on U.S. television. White House officials and certain members of the U.S. Congress made even sharper remarks: Things went so far that they started to use, let's say, nonparliamentary expressions.

But good luck to them. In my view, a very important and serious question arises here. A very great deal is said in America about the needs for a free exchange of views, even more is said about freedom of speech; there is talk of the need for the two peoples to know each other better. A situation arose in which certain thoughts were expressed that the President and the White House did not like and all the words about freedom of speech were forgotten, all the words about the exchange of views were forgotten. What is more, the pressure was so great that ABC, an independent, free company, made its apologies to the President.

I ask myself, what will happen now? In particular, how are we going to conduct our relations with the Americans? You saw the Leningrad-Seattle telebridge, and you saw for yourselves how our people and the Americans strive to get to know each other, how they want to talk. It was the first bridge widely shown in the United States. And will any more bridges be shown? There is no doubt, you see, that opinions and views that are not to the White House's liking will be expressed, just as on the U.S. side, I might add, views are expressed that are not to the liking of our government. But we have shown the bridges, we showed this one. And I can vouch for the fact that we will continue to show them. But what about over there? Will we be able to survive to the year 2000 if we cannot talk to each other? These are very serious questions. And the fact that Americans want to learn more and to maintain contacts is unequivocally true.

Reception Held

PM171053 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 17 Mar 86 First Edition p 5

[TASS report: "In Honor of the Soviet Delegation"]

[Text] Beijing, 16 Mar -- PRC State Council Deputy Premier Li Peng gave a reception in honor of the Soviet delegation headed by USSR Council of Ministers First Deputy Chairman I.V. Arkhipov, which arrived in Beijing today to attend the first session of the Soviet-Chinese commission on economic, trade, and scientific-technical cooperation.

As a result of joint efforts by both sides, Li Peng noted in his speech, recent years have seen a marked revival of trade between the two countries and a resumption of economic and scientific-techncial cooperation. A good foundation has been laid. We noted that the 27th CPSU Congress outlined measures aimed at accelerating scientific-technical progress. This will create favorable conditions for the further development of trade and economic ties between the Soviet Union and China. The government and people of the PRC value the Soviet people's friendly feelings. In this connection, the speaker noted the need to make an effort to remove obstacles in relations between the two countries.

I.V. Arkhipov then spoke, stressing the historic significance of the 27th CPSU Congress for the the entire activity of the party and Soviet state. He pointed out the importance of the USSR's foreign policy initiatives geared to ensuring that mankind greets the year 2000 under a peaceful sky and space. The Soviet delegation leader expressed satisfaction in connection with the definite improvement in mutual relations between the Soviet Union and its great neighbor, socialist China, and with the continuing development of Soviet-Chinese ties and contacts which are acquiring increasing scope and becoming increasingly diverse.

Noting that the implementation of the long-term Soviet-Chinese agreements signed in December 1984 and July 1985 will be a considerable contribution to this process, the first deputy chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers expressed confidence that the present talks in Beijing will be successful and fruitful and the results of the commission's work will be a fine stimulus to more effective Soviet-Chinese business ties and the improvement of their forms and will make them more varied and dynamic.

CPSU VIEWS FURTHER PRC RELATIONS 'SIGNIFICANT'

OW161047 Moscow Radio Peace and Progress in Mandarin to China 0400 GMT 14 Mar 86

[Glebov commentary]

[Excerpts] Listeners: The CPSU thinks that further development of Soviet-Chinese cooperative relations is of great significance. The Political Report of the 27th CPSU National Congress emphatically pointed out: The reserves for cooperation between the Soviet Union and China are enormous. They are great because such cooperation is in the interests of both countries and because what is most dear to our people -- socialism and peace -- are indivisible. Glebov, our station observer, has the following comments on such cooperation: The Soviet Union and China had a glorious tradition of cooperation. A clear proof of this fact is that the Soviet Union gave tremendous aid to China in the fifties to help it build a socialist economic foundation. In the late fifties and early sixties, Soviet-Chinese relations gradually became complicated. Nevertheless, the Soviet Union was not to blame for the change. Imperialist cliques openly praised the change.

Recently, our two countries have gradually removed the shadows cast on our bilateral relations. Deputy heads of Soviet and Chinese Governments have exchanged visits for the first time in many years and signed agreements on trade, further exchanges of visits, and economic and technological cooperation. The Soviet Union will take part in building 7 and rebuilding 17 facilities in China in accordance with the cooperation agreements. The two countries are increasing cultural and sports contacts according to plans. The relations between Soviet and Chinese mass organizations are also developing steadily.

The Political Report of the CPSU Central Committee pointed out: One can speak with satisfaction about a certain improvement in the Soviet Union's relations with its great neighbor, socialist China.

Differences in approaches remain, particularly toward a series of international problems. There is, however, something else we note: The possibility in many cases of working jointly, or acting together on the basis of principle and equal rights without prejudice to third countries.

The Soviet people hope that the positive trend in the Soviet-Chinese relations will develop further. We believe that this conforms to the interests of the two countries, their peoples, and all other people who treasure peace and socialism.

[Report by Boris Kalyagin in Stockholm from the "Vremya" newscast]

[Excerpt] The USSR Government delegation arrived in the capital of Sweden today. It is headed by Nikolay Ivanovich Ryzhkov. On behalf of the Soviet people and government, Comrade Ryzhkov expressed deep condolences to the Swedish people in connection with Olof Palme's tragic death.

Many Swedish prominent figures are emphasizing these days that the continuation of his policies will become the best memorial for Palme. This has also been confirmed by Ingvar Carlsson, new prime minister of the country. At his first press conference, he explained that Sweden will continue its struggle against the threat of nuclear war, for a ban on nuclear weapons testing and a freezing of their arsenals.

A question put forward by the "Vremya" program: The late Prime Minister Olof Palme was going to visit the Soviet Union in April. Are you, Mr Prime Minister, intending to take up this agreement and visit our country? What on the whole is your evaluation of Soviet-Swedish relations?

["Speech by Comrade I.O. Gorbachev (Chief Director of the Leningrad A.S. Pushkin State Academy Drama Theater and USSR People's Artist)" (PRAVDA headline) delivered at 1 March session of 27th CPSU Congress]

[Text] Esteemed comrades! The first thing on the mind of everyone who mounts this lofty rostrum is probably how to express more accurately his attitude toward what he has heard and felt with special keenness during our congress' work. And of course, the first thing to be mentioned is the party Central Committee Political Report, which was delivered by Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev and has formed the basis of the frank, pointed, but at the same time also trusting discussion with the whole party and our entire multimillion-strong people. (applause)

The keenness and precision of thought, the purposefulness, and the class thrust of the report revealed to everyone with astonishing clarity, with what I would describe as piercing clarity, the very profound implications of the great restructuring, realistic assessments of the troubled modern world, and the very complex problems of social development and ways of resolving these issues.

I am an actor. Every time I go on stage I feel particularly keenly that, all the same, the most important thing for an artist is his civic position. In the vast complex of extremely complicated problems that are today being aired beneath the vaults of this hall, there is one that determines everything — acceleration and intensification. But it is very important not to narrow down these concepts but to firmly understand that acceleration and intensification are not only economic terms but above all and most of all moral terms, for they demand of people a new, a qualitatively new, attitude toward labor. (applause)

The restructuring that has begun of all aspects of our society's life has met with Soviet people's full support. (applause)

Soviet people expect from working people in the arts works whose heroes are truly active, energetic, alive, and capable of real action. To be honest, I have long dreamed of producing a show about a party worker, a real Communist, a struggler, a contemporary of mine. After all, I know many such people. I am acquainted with them in real life. (applause) But, alas, there are clearly not enough heroes like that in literature, on the stage, and in the movies!

But it is not a question of a simple formula for some kind of tidied-up, purely positive hero. No. We need different heroes. Romantic heroes, satirical heroes to promote healing through laughter, and, finally, heroes who have just been spotted in life and have not yet been sized up. Let this hero experience incredible difficulties and tragic conflicts, let his life be struggle, but let him nonetheless be a hero, a model, for whom you feel, whom you trust, and who has the truth, the historical truth, on his side! (applause)

The resolute struggle that has begun in our society against all kinds of immorality, complacency, lack of principle, and spiritual laxity opens up broad scope for the quests of such a hero who refuses to tolerate the situation that has been created. It is very important for us artists to feel this, to feel it and to take it to heart. Are we ready for this? In the main, we certainly are. Evidence of that is provided by successful shows, the many successful shows marking the 40th anniversary of victory, the excellent shows produced by the whole country's theaters to mark our congress, as the ardent and joyful reaction from our audience attests.

The draft new edition of the party program speaks of optimism as a powerful factor in people's education. And it is a question not of the kind of optimism that has often, it must be admitted, varnished and embellished reality and portrayed wishful thinking as reality. The optimism that the party summons us to feel today is based on a realistic assessment of our life. It contains hope and belief in the future and offers scope for bold, resolute action against everything that still prevents us from living.

We often speak of the increased role of art. But, alas, we much more rarely recall a vital demand of the day — the increasing of the responsibility of the people professionally employed in art for the ideological profundity and artistic perfection of the works that we create.

The degree of responsibility that the cultural figure assumes presupposes above all ruthless artistic and civic exactingness toward himself. And if he lacks that quality, if he is prepared to abandon the truth for the sake of immediate interests and the demands of the latest fashion, his position is not only sterile but immoral. (applause)

Real artists are worried by the desire of some theaters to draw capacity crowds at all costs, by pandering to undemanding tastes. It is worrying that a kind of consumer of art has appeared who goes to the theater or the movies or sinks into his chair in front of the television set with a feeling of vacant indifference and with an "imperious" certainty that he will now be amused, entertained, or presented with something "a bit spicy" and "action-packed" [kramolnyy].

The concept of culture as merely entertainment and as a primitive consumer service is not merely a naive delusion, it is a fundamental mistake. The lofty task of art is not merely to respond to the viewer's existing demands but also — and this is the most important thing — to shape those demands and to inculcate a genuine understanding of real values. (applause)

It is worrying that certain movies, shows, and books inculcate philistinism and are full of naturalistic scenes capable of causing indifference in human life and apolitical attitudes.

For some reason — voluntarily or otherwise — we have lost breadth in our view of life and have lapsed into positions of abstract humanism and pacifism, into positions of extra class concepts of good and evil.

It is time to stop, to think, and to ask such authors: Where are you going? What are you calling for? (applause)

Yes, we have no right to turn a blind eye to the shortcomings that exist in our country or to human vices — they must be discussed openly, sorrowfully, and publicly so that they can be combated more successfully. But is it worth going into hysterics when you notice a scab on a healthy body? No. (applause)

It is one hundred times more important, and this is obvious, to help man and society to get rid of an ailment, to reveal the mechanism for combating vice, and to develop immunity to any social virus.

Unfortunately there is an almost total absence of historical and heroic patriotic plays on the contemporary stage. Yet our state's history contains many significant events and glorious names of which we are entitled to be proud and which can and must become the ideal that the younger generation needs so badly. (applause) Their images and their truly popular character — that is the living thread linking us with our history. In breaking that thread we inevitably cut ourselves off from the main sources of our spiritual strength.

The party Central Committee has repeatedly censured us over the existing distortions in art. Time is passing, but it is still too early to speak of a resolute breakthrough in this matter. It is simply impossible yet.

Of course, any artist can make a mistake. But now, at the qualitatively new stage in our life, it is time with proper firmness and clarity to make a principled assessment of the subjective revelations and introspection that are sometimes passed off as artistic discoveries. Incredible praise for the successes of some and undeserved hushing up of the deeds of others cannot be tolerated. (applause) This erodes criteria, removes reference points, and lights false beacons and causes them to shine brightly. (applause) Here, I am firmly convinced, artistic criticism has always had and continues to have the first word. But often, unfortunately, what happens is this: A group of critics coalesces, so to speak, around a newspaper or journal, turning it into their own preserve and outlining "their own" circle of writers, theaters, directors, and actors. Then unprejudiced attitudes and objectivity — the very things that define criticism — are pushed into the background.

The quality of the artistic process would certainly be higher if press organs, especially the central press, displayed a more considered approach toward assessing works and were more deeply aware of their responsibility in molding the political maturity and creative and social activeness of masters of word, stage, screen, and canvas.

As the party Central Committee Political Report emphasizes: "...criticism is a public matter, not a sphere serving authors' self-esteem and ambitions." It could not be better put. (applause)

Unfortunately, we too, the Communists in creative collectives and unions who make up more than half the members of artistic councils, publishing councils, and exhibition committees, by no means always display party principledness and professional exactingness in assessing our own creative labor and that of our colleagues. We often show a conciliatory attitude toward the appearance of superficial and showy works that lack ideological commitment.

Many questions of artistic life were discussed in the press on the eve of the congress. There was talk not only of creativity, but also of what is preventing art from fulfilling its tasks. You will probably think it ridiculous but, paradoxical though it may seem, gross output indicators are a heavy burden not only on enterprises, but also on art. For some reason a plan for a certain number of productions over the course of the year is set for each theater. It doesn't matter what the productions are, but there has to be the number of them that was planned from above without fail.

It is time to revise the system for the planning and organization of the creative process and to give theaters, movie studios, and concert collectives greater independence and thereby increase their responsibility for the quality of their work and for its ideological and artistic results. In other words: Show more trust — we will vindicate it! (applause)

There is one last thing I want to mention from the congress rostrum. We cannot remain indifferent to the state of a number of ancient architectural monuments, theater buildings, and buildings of other cultural enlightenment institutions that either undergo constant, perpetual repairs, or else are not repaired at all. The resources of major libraries and very rich collections of visual art are excluded from the cultural process because of this. In many respects the material and technical base of culture is not up to contemporary demands. The existing scale of its renewal does not ensure the fulfillment of the tasks facing this sphere. The existing "leftover" principle governing the allocation of resources for social and cultural aims by which planning organs are still guided runs counter to the party's aims of improving working people's well-being and cultural standard. (applause)

Comrades! When you ponder the extremely complex tasks facing us today, you realize with particular keenness that they can be fulfilled only when every one of us grasps one very simple truth: Our art is a most important partywide, state task. And it must be carried out as the most important, the most responsible party assignment. I am happy to be involved in this great task! (prolonged applause)

Gorkiy Obkom's Khristoradnov

Second Edition p 6

["Speech by Comrade Yu.N. Khristoradnov, First Secretary of Gorkiy CPSU Obkom" (PRAVDA headline) delivered at 3 March morning session of 27th CPSU Congress]

[Text] Esteemed comrades! Our party and its Central Committee have a remarkable inherent quality — the ability at particularly crucial moments of life to focus the immense power of the Soviet people's creative forces and energy on the implementation of the most important sociopolitical and socioeconomic tasks of the country's development and the utilization of our socialist system's immense potential.

The entire atmosphere of the congress, its innovative spirit, and the Soviet people's unanimous support for the decisions made by the congress are convincing confirmation of that.

The vivid and convincing CPSU Central Committee Political Report delivered by Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev has been a powerful boost to the combat mood of our entire party and the entire Soviet people. (applause) It is augmented by the new edition of the CPSU Program which the congress has adopted and the provisions of Nikolay Ivanovich Ryzhkov's report "On the Basic Guidelines of the USSR's Economic and Social Development in 1986-1990 and the Period Through the Year 2000."

And Lenin's idea that a new situation requires not just the repetition of rote-learned formulas and slogans but "initiative, intellectual flexibility, inventiveness, and independent work..." and responsibility at each post entrusted to us by the party and the motherland is more vivid and fresh today than ever.

As delegates have already noted, it has not been long since the Central Committee April (1985) Plenum. However, what has already been done, both in the center and locally, has created in the people an atmosphere of optimism and cohesion around the party which currently reigns in the country and gives confidence that the historic decisions of the 27th congress will be fulfilled and the concept of accelerating the country's socioeconomic development will become a reality of our life. (applause)

Reflecting the will of the 260,000-strong party organization and all the oblast's working people, the Gorkiy delegation wholly and fully supports the political line and approves the practical activity of the CPSU Central Committee and its innovative approach to the resolution of the problems that have accumulated in the economy and society.

The oblast's Communists have drawn conclusions from the party Central Committee's demands about increasing the role and responsibility of major industrial centers in resolving the growing tasks of developing the country' economy and accelerating scientific and technical progress. Critically assessing what has been achieved, we are restructuring the work of party committees and soviet and economic organs and increasing the responsibility of cadres and primary party organizations. We are striving to ensure that they are genuine leaders of labor collectives and take an active part in drawing up production plans, seeking out and utilizing reserves, and improving discipline.

Growth rates in industrial production increased in the final year of the 5-year plan. The targets for output sales and deliveries of the most important types of articles were fulfilled ahead of schedule.

Growth in industrial and agricultural production in the oblast in the 11th 5-Year Plan amounted to R10 billion and R100 million respectively. Labor productivity increased 20 percent and the volume of agricultural construction and restructuring of the countryside was expanded.

The expansion of economic, scientific, and technical cooperation with the CEMA countries, the creation of a number of projects, and reconstruction using equipment from foreign countries had a positive effect on the development of the oblast's economy. The oblast's enterprises are increasing export shipments of motor vehicles, buses, metal-cutting machine tools, maritime equipment, and other output.

However, all this gives no grounds for complacency, since the oblast failed to cope with the 5-year plan targets for a number of important indicators, and many collectives' reserves and potential were not fully utilized. This showed the inadequate purposefulness of certain party organizations and the reluctance of a certain number of cadres to cope with the increased tasks and use their initiative and persistence to counter difficulties. A number of gorkoms and raykoms sometimes substituted petty tutelage for political work to mobilize Communists and collectives to fulfill their socialist pledges and increase demandingness toward leaders. Party control of the CPSU obkom was also insufficiently implemented in the prevailing situation.

The criticisms and recommendations indicated in the directives of the party Central Committee and the USSR Supreme Soviet Presidium in connection with the examination of our reports and during the course of meetings between Andrey Andreyevich Gromyko, member of the CPSU Central Committee Politburo and chairman of the USSR Supreme Soviet Presidium, with the oblast aktiv and the large collectives at the motor vehicle plant and the "Krasnyy Sormov" plant were an invaluable help in improving the style and working methods of the oblast party organization.

Taking into account the existing lags in the standard of social and leisure services and the criticisms expressed in the light of the growing tasks of the 12th 5-Year Plan, the CPSU obkom is orienting the activity of party, soviet, and economic organs and leading cadres toward accelerating socioeconomic development by reconstructing and retooling enterprises and is working on questions of expanding the construction of housing (especially for young people), solving transport problems (particularly, the commissioning of the first phase of the Gorkiy subway), improving medical, cultural, and consumer services to the population, and improving cadre training to ensure that the organic resolution of the problems of enhancing organization and improving production and working and leisure conditions creates the basis for each collective and the oblast as a whole to fulfill the tasks of the 12th 5-Year Plan.

I would like to support the provisions in the reports and comrades' speeches about the need to improve integration in work and to step up the influence of administrative organs on developing the social and production infrastructure and coordinating and monitoring the work of the organizations under their jurisdiction.

The oblast's enterprises are increasing their contribution to the development of the country's gas transport complex, expanding deliveries of equipment and machines, and creating capacities for the production of main pipelines.

At the same time, as a result of the narrow departmental attitude of a number of ministry leaders, the capacities created at the Vyksunskiy metallurgical plant for the production of 500,000 metric tons of multilayer pipes per year for building high-pressure main gas pipelines, on which more than R120 million has been spent and at which 17,000 metric tons of equipment has been installed, are not being used properly. And gas pipelines continue to be bought from abroad.

Ministry leaders Comrades Chirskov, Chernomyrdin, and Kolpakov continue to compile joint protocols and measures defining the period when domestically produced pipelines will start to be used. And we do not understand why state committees — for planning and for material and technical supply — take the position of outside observers on this question.

Or another example. For a number of years it has not been possible to coordinate territorial and sector interests in the leatherworkers' city of Bogorodsk, where the approximately 15 kindred light industry enterprises of all-union and republic subordination located in this traditional center of the leather industry are under the jurisdiction of 7 main administrations, do not coordinate their work, are reducing indicators, and are not resolving social problems practically .

In the fetters of departmental barriers, questions of technical progress are not properly resolved either. Instead of reconstructing obsolete enterprises, the USSR Ministry of Light Industry decided to build a new caprolon production facility, on which more than one 5-year period and considerable millions in state funds have been spent but from which no output has yet been obtained. And it turns out that equipment is standing idle at the new premises while the old shops are not producing the proper returns. This can hardly be called a proprietorial approach to matters on the part of the USSR Ministry of Light Industry.

Improving quality — from output quality to the quality of all our activity — is a determining condition in the practical implementation of the concept of acceleration.

For Gorkiy's collectives, which mass-produce trucks, machine tools, ships, gas motor compressors, and other products, this demand is particularly acute and topical. We cannot tolerate the fact that production lines are producing machines that are of a questionable standard or are defective. Recognizing the demands of the times, truck worker collectives are restructuring their work, technological processes, and flowlines, are beefing up demands and normatives, are improving the durability and technical standard of motor vehicles, and are replacing obsolete equipment.

One of the most important tasks in this respect is the fundamental reconstruction and retooling of the Gorkiy truck plant — the country's biggest supplier of freight vehicles — and its transition to a qualitatively new level — the production of high-capacity trucks with diesel (instead of gasoline) engines.

Gorkiy's truck builders, supporting their Volga colleagues' initiative, have adopted counterpledges which, along with increasing volume indicators, plan to renew the models of the light and freight vehicles that are produced and ensure growth in their production without increasing the number of workers and the use of metal.

The proposals and program of the plant's collective are supported by the party Central Committee and the government and have been included in the state plan. Measures are also being implemented to improve the quality standards and finish of vehicles in order to expand export shipments of them. Considerable work is being carried out to expand the production of vehicles running on gas fuel. Series production of the new version of the Volga-24-10 car was assimilated in time for the 27th CPSU Congress.

The accelerated transition to the production of vehicles and trains with air-cooled diesel engines will make it possible to increase the productivity of each vehicle by 50 percent and to substantially reduce fuel expenditure and material-intensiveness. The country's national economy will benefit economically to the tune of not less than R400 million per year. The expenditure on reconstructing the plant will be recouped in 3-3 and 1/2 years.

That will be the practical response of the people of Gorkiy — workers and engineers — to the party directive to accelerate the development of the country's economy. The oblast's Communists consider the resolution of this task to be one of the most important state affairs and believe that the same approach will be adopted by the Ministry of the Automotive Industry and its leadership, the USSR Gosplan, the USSR Ministry of Construction, and the USSR Ministry of Installation and Special Construction Work. We are counting on capital investment, material resources, and equipment being fully allocated and the development of the work of construction and installation organizations being accelerated.

The amount of reequipping to be carried out at the plant is so great that it is impossible to manage without the active participation of many of the country's collectives and national economic sectors, which have been instructed by the government to participate in the implementation of the outlined measures. However, even now these tasks are being misunderstood and there are incorrect approaches to the allocation of funds and the manufacture of equipment on the part of ministries, departments, and planning organs. But this also fully applies to the plant's associated plants in terms of preparing production and delivering components for the assimilation of new vehicles. We are counting on this definite task also being resolved by newly created structural administrations — I am thinking of the USSR Council of Ministers bureaus for machine building — which must make their own weighty contribution.

The raising of national economic efficiency depends to a considerable extent on the level of development and the improvement of transport communications, primarily rail transport, which has not yet ensured the complete resolution of the set tasks in our region. The main cause here, along with failings in utilizing the rolling stock, is the prevailing disproportions in the development of the production base.

Along with the activation of work locally and in collectives, we justifiably expect the Ministries of Railways and Transport Construction to step up efforts in examining the questions that have built up linked with the reconstruction and reequipping of locomotive depots, stations, and a number of transport terminals, including Gorkiy; and, according to specialists' conclusions, there is an urgent need to redistribute freight traffic and to build a railroad bypassing Gorkiy.

Comrades! As was stressed in the CPSU Central Committee Political Report and the report "On the Basic Guidelines for the USSR's Economic and Social Development in 1986-1990 and the Period Through the Year 2000," the intensification and accelerated development of the economy require improved comprehensiveness in decisions and coordinated actions on the part of various ministries and a deeper use of the reserves in territorial and intersector cooperation.

Life has led us to the only correct and objective decision — to create in the center and locally a well-organized system of agro-industrial complex organs.

And we hope that party committees will now play their proper role in this sphere as organs of political leadership.

Considering the provisions of the reports by M.S. Gorbachev and N.I. Ryzhkov about the need to improve territorial administration and planning and the practice of our industrially developed and multifaceted industrial oblast, one comes to the conclusion that, along with the forms of organizing territorial planning, it is necessary to seek forms of organizing intersector collaboration and coordination in territories that correspond to the country's political and administrative division. Currently these purely economic functions often have to be implemented willy-nilly by the oblast party committee.

The USSR Gosplan's concentration in the future on major, key questions makes it possible to think about the purposefulness of creating a territorial organ of intersector state administration in major economic regions. But these organs, in our opinion, should not repeat the groundless experience of creating economic regions that are divorced from the party structure of former planning commissions, but instead should collaborate closely with the party structure.

And there is another question which is extremely worrying and holds back the intensification of the oblast's national economy — this is the lag in implementing the energy supply network. Despite the fact that the oblast produces equipment and assemblies for nuclear power stations and conducts experimental work, the region's power capacities lag behind the growing needs of industrial and agricultural production.

The oblast party organization has drawn up and is implementing a number of measures to save energy, reduce unit expenditure of energy resources, and improve supplies of heat and electricity for industrial, municipal and everyday needs. But the national economy's stable work, taking account of the restriction in fuel resources, can only be ensured by building a nuclear power station and reconstructing power supply networks. We think these problems which concern us will be properly resolved and taken into account in the Basic Guidelines for the USSR's economic and social development in the years to come.

Esteemed comrades! Lenin's behest — to clearly see the outlined goals, not to be content with what has been achieved, to go further, to achieve more, and to actively switch to the resolution of ever-increasing tasks — has been and remains guidance for our action.

The discussion and adoption by the congress of the new edition of the program, the changes to the CPSU Statutes, and the Basic Guidelines for the country's economic and social development in the future accord with the nature of the demands of the present day and the party's activity under contemporary conditions, cement its ranks, and strengthen and develop its organizational forms.

Allow me to assure you that Communists and all of Gorkiy Oblast's working people, true to their glorious revolutionary and labor traditions, will augment their contribution to the further strengthening of the motherland's economic and defense potential and will make every effort to successfully fulfill the decisions of the 27th congress of our Leninist party. (applause)

Tsentrosoyuz Board's Trunov

PM061345 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 5 Mar 86
Second Edition p 2

["Speech by Comrade M.P. Trunov, Chairman of the Tsentrosoyuz Board" (PRAVDA headline) delivered at 3 March afternoon session of the CPSU Congress]

[Text] Esteemed comrade delegates! The essence of the changes initiated by the CPSU Central Committee April (1985) Plenum and described with such impressive force by Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, in the Political Report to the congress, evidently consists of an all-out mobilization of the resources needed to accelerate the country's socioeconomic development.

Much attention was also devoted to this issue in the report of Nikolay Ivanovich Ryzhkov, member of the CPSU Central Committee Politburo and chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers. The congress documents clearly define the main avenues of long-term national economic development and reveal the ways and means of effectively utilizing our economic potential to satisfy the Soviet people's requirements for food and other goods and services.

The reorganization which has begun will, of course, also fully affect cooperative organizations. V.I. Lenin once pointed out: "It is essential to involve the very grassroots in supply work, and we must formulate this as the main task of the cooperative movement..." The success of this cause, in Lenin's words, depends on the cooperative movement's ability "to gather up scattered marketable values and to produce new ones."

As you know, the consumer cooperative movement has played an active part in the implementation of the CPSU's socioeconomic policy at all stages of the Soviet state's development. Thanks to tremendous help from the party and the state it has developed into a ramified and diversified system, closely connected with the country's entire national economy. Cooperative organizations unite tens of millions of kolkhoz members, workers, and rural intelligentsia; they serve over 40 percent of the country's population. The cooperative movement accounts for the procurement of 50 percent of potatoes, one-third of fruit and vegetable products, and 35 percent of bread production. We have more than 500,000 trade outlets, procurement points, and production enterprises. Thus Tsentrosoyuz has a large social and economic potential at its disposal. And in the near future this potential will increase further. Early this year, the CPSU Central Committee and the USSR Council of Ministers adopted a resolution on the further development of consumer cooperatives. Capital investments totaling R3 billion are earmarked for the construction, reconstruction, and retooling of enterprises for the procurement and processing of agricultural produce in 1986-90 — this is as much as was invested for this purpose during the preceding 20 years. More than 10,000 general reception and procurement points are to be opened, and storage and refrigeration facilities capable of holding approximately 500,000 metric tons of produce at any one time are to be brought into service.

In reorganizing our work, and even more so in pursuing the commissioning of new capacities, we must, of course, radically improve the utilization of the great potential which is inherent in the very nature of the consumer cooperative organization which is based on the principles of self-management, self-financing, and the working people's broad participation in solving the problem of supplies for the population. Substantial real reserves for improving the working people's living conditions lie precisely in the development of the cooperative organizations' economic initiative and socialist entrepreneurship.

In critically analyzing our work in light of the demands expressed in the report, we see that it by no means matches contemporary requirements and that available marketable resources are being mobilized inadequately. The existing practice of procurement planning and the economic management machinery are not conducive to the development of consumer cooperative employees' initiative. At the present production level the population's requirements for many products could be met much better if existing administrative restrictions were removed, if parochial tendencies were overcome, and the interests of the country as a whole were given priority over the narrow interests of individual rayons.

Is it perhaps normal that consumer cooperative organizations in Moldavia, for instance, absorb less than 3 percent of the vegetables grown by the population, and that in Uzbekistan they absorb only 15 percent of the fruit grown. Frequently, Tsentrosoyuz is incapable of promptly and swiftly shipping fruit or vegetables from one region to another where these products are virtually unobtainable or are sold at the kolkhoz market at greatly inflated prices. Last year inter-republic shipments accounted for less than 5 percent of the total volume of products procured from the population. The main problem is that the shipment of products outside a republic or oblast is unjustifiably linked with the fulfillment of purchase plans by rayons, oblasts, krays, and republics.

Tsentrosoyuz sees its task in greatly boosting the inter-republic and inter-oblast exchange this year in cooperation with the USSR State Agro-Industrial Committee and republic councils of ministers, in maneuvering resources on an extensive scale, increasing the influx of products into the city cooperative trade network, and exerting a powerful economic influence on the kolkhoz market. We intend to increase the inter-republic cooperative trade fund to total at least 20 percent of the overall volume of purchases, gearing it as appropriate to plans for the procurement and deliveries of products into the all-union fund.

The decisive contribution to meeting the country's requirements for agricultural products is, of course, made by kolkhozes and sovkhozes. However, the measures provided for in the USSR Food Program to develop personal subsidiary plots can also make a tangible contribution to the food supply. An important economic incentive for consumer cooperative purchases of products from the population is the establishment of agreed prices. During the last 5-year plan approximately 5 million metric tons of meat and 32 million metric tons of potatoes, fruit, and vegetables were purchased on these terms. And although these products are marketed in cities at prices which are higher than the state prices, they are considerably lower than the prices at kolkhoz markets. And, most important, the inhabitants of many cities were provided with an important, additional source of fresh meat, poultry, high-grade sausage products, smoked foods, fruit, nuts, honey, and other products.

There is something else I would like to say. Cooperative trade could occupy a more important place in Moscow. However, our proposals to this effect were rejected. Now, with the backing of city organizations' interest, we intend to open cooperative stores in all the capital's rayons and at kolkhoz markets.

Comrades, new opportunities are opening up for cooperative organizations in connection with the authorization of kolkhozes and sovkhozes to use products produced in excess of the plan (and in the case of potatoes, fruit, and vegetables also a substantial proportion of the planned output) as they see fit, including selling it via cooperative trade outlets. In view of this, we intend to increase sales of agricultural products in city stores by R5 billion over the year, that is, to double it in comparison with the current level.

In tackling tasks connected with the utilization of additional resources to augment food supplies to the population, consumer cooperatives are developing a network of integrated enterprises, which includes quick-assembly, modular-design buildings to house reception points, sausage product production shops, shops for the preliminary processing of meat, and so forth. At the moment more than 300 such enterprises are in the installation stage and it is planned to commission a total of 2,200 such enterprises during this 5-year plan. We also give priority importance to the development of a network of small-scale enterprises to process fruit and vegetables close to the raw material base and to mass procurement localities.

Tsentrosoyuz intends to obtain R68 billion worth of food resources in the current 5-year plan — R14 billion more than during the last 5-year plan — by means of purchases of agricultural products, the production of food products at cooperative enterprises, and fattening of livestock and poultry. This is not an easy task, but it is quite feasible. In cooperation with party and soviet organs at the local level, we will persistently seek ways of further increasing resources to improve food supplies to the population.

As for the expansion of capacities envisaged in the CPSU Central Committee and USSR Council of Ministers resolution, we cover a large proportion of the new construction from our own resources. But we cannot manage without the assistance of the construction ministries. Meanwhile, the USSR Ministry of Construction has already cut back the volume of construction for the consumer cooperative organization which it had been allocated. And the USSR Ministry of Industrial construction and the USSR Ministry of Construction of Heavy Industry Enterprises are setting lower construction ceilings than in 1986 for the subsequent years of the 5-year plan. We hope that these ministries will find a way to increase attention to projects within our system, which has a direct bearing on the social sphere.

We give great importance to the development of the production of nonfood products. To be frank, comrades, the disbandment of industrial cooperatives in the late fifties has impoverished the market and led to the disappearance of many small articles which are nonetheless essential in daily life. To rebuild this industry is not easy. We must establish new enterprises everywhere, supply them with equipment, and train cadres. There are, for instance, plenty of opportunities within our system to increase the production of work clothes and inexpensive clothes from nonstandard leather and raw fur materials and other goods based on local and secondary resources.

No less important is the task of boosting the participation of cooperative organizations in the social restructuring of the countryside. For many years the question of supplies to the population of timber and construction materials was not being tackled. Following the intervention of the CPSU Central Committee the situation began to improve. During this 5-year plan sales to rural inhabitants of materials for the construction and maintenance of housing and garden plot amenities are to be doubled. An extensive program for the establishment of modern construction material stores, trade centers, rural department stores, and public catering enterprises has been drawn up.

I would like to note that as a result of the measures adopted by the party to combat drunkenness and alcoholism, which met with the warm approval of Communists and all Soviet people, positive changes have emerged recently in the structure of the trade turnover. During the January-February period trade turnover increased by almost 10 percent with a simultaneous sharp decline (by one-third) of sales of alcoholic drinks. Tsentrosoyuz is taking the steps necessary to eliminate shortcomings in the organization of trade, violation of regulations pertaining to the sale of goods, and other negative phenomena, of which, unfortunately, there are still quite a few in this sphere.

Comrades! The propositions put forward in the Political Report about the need for the continued development of self-management and strict observance of democratic principles in the leadership of kolkhozes and other cooperative organizations are extremely topical. In practice we are constantly confronting a clearly abnormal situation where consumer cooperative organizations are practically prevented from adopting the necessary decisions independently because they are excessively restricted in their activities by numerous instructions handed out by the USSR Ministry of Finance, the USSR State Bank, the USSR State Committee for Labor and Social Problems, and other organs.

In our view, a law on consumer cooperatives is needed which would clearly define the mutual relations between cooperative and state organizations and enable the cooperative organizations to be freed from all kinds of bureaucratic restrictions.

Consumer cooperative workers received with great enthusiasm the propositions of the new edition of the CPSU Program stating that the party is backing efforts to improve the activities of kolkhozes and consumer and other cooperative organizations and associations, regarding them as an important form of socialist self-management and an effective means of national economic development.

Tsentrosoyuz and cooperative organizations at the local level will spare no effort in order to increase their contribution to the implementation of the USSR Food Program and the comprehensive program for goods and services and will mobilize all their potential and reserves for the successful implementation of the decisions of the 27th CPSU Congress and for improving the level of national well-being. (applause)

Krasnoyarsk Kraykom's Fedirko

PM061545 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 5 Mar 86 Second Edition pp 2-3

["Speech by Comrade P.S. Fedirko, First Secretary of the Krasnoyarsk CPSU Kraykom" (PRAVDA headline) delivered at 3 March afternoon session of the 27th CPSU Congress]

[tExt] Comrade delegates! All we congress participants can say with firm conviction that the 27th party congress does indeed have a historic role in the path of our advance to communism. In the documents submitted for discussion by the congress and in the CPSU Central Committee Political Report the strategy for accelerating the country's socioeconomic development put forward by the Central Committee April Plenum has acquired a firm scientific basis and explicit forms, specific content, and further intensification and improvement.

The Communists and all working people of Krasnoyarsk Kray approve fully the Central Committee's political line and practical activity and the party's strategic course toward attaining a new qualitative state for Soviet society.

At working people's meetings and gatherings now, the Krasnoyarsk Kray Siberians are stating their resolve to use their selfless labor to strengthen the might of our motherland. Having embarked on a shock labor stint in honor of the congress, they are working in an atmosphere of lofty businesslike exhilaration.

For us this is important, because it is a logical continuation of the struggle to fulfill party and government targets, to effect a resolute breakthrough in the economy, and to mobilize existing reserves, which was characteristic of the entire period of precongress socialist competition.

As is well known, the prospects for the development of the kray's economy were defined by the CPSU Central Committee and USSR Council of Ministers resolution "On Measures for the Further Comprehensive Development of Krasnoyarsk Kray's Production Forces in 1981-1990." It must be said immediately that in fulfilling this very important resolution far from everything has taken shape favorably in our kray and serious shortcomings have been allowed in implementing a number of very important directions. And it is no accident that the June conference at the Central Committee on questions of scientific-technical progress, the kray was among those rightly subjected to serious criticism. There's no denying that it is indeed always hard to hear criticism; but nonetheless the main thrust consists in understanding and reacting to it correctly, and we ourselves have been convinced of this.

It must be admitted that the dimensions of the transformations which are taking place in the kray have generated elements of complacency, indifference, and lack of principle among certain economic leaders and party workers. Nor have we avoided the need to take steps to prevent some moral violations by individual workers.

As a whole the demand voiced at the June conference — achieving the point where multibillion capital investments produce a more rapid return — would in practice mean for us the need to undertake the most serious restructuring of the party leadership of the kray's economic and social development.

Under the conditions of the prevailing situation, it was essential to turn the party, economic, and other cadres sharply toward work in the new style and resolutely set about putting right shortcomings, overcoming the resistence of inertia, conservatism, old traditions, and superannuated forms and methods of work. These questions were also raised keenly at report and election party meetings and conferences.

The party kraykom is focusing the efforts of the party, Soviet, and economic organs on work at grassroots level in party organizations and labor collectives. Attention is focused on monitoring the fulfillment of the decisions taken. Comprehensive checks on the party committees have begun to be held regularly and specific aid is rendered to them. And we have begun to obtain more effective results. This has made it possible to introduce large-scale capacities at the Borodino coal pit and the "Krastyazhmash" association. All hydraulic units at the Sayano-Shushesnakay and Maynskaya GES's have been commissioned, and the construction of the Kureyko and Boguchany GES's has been continued more actively. Planned capacities have been commissioned at the metallurgical plant in Norilsk and the petroleum refinery in Achinsk. The Sayanskiy aluminum plant has begun to produce output.

It may confidently be said that the working people's activeness has markedly increased everywhere. The growth of industrial production in the second half of last year was 5.9 percent as against 1.4 percent in the first half. As a result the 1985 plan for the sale and production of output and labor productivity was overfulfilled. This made it possible in the 11th 5-Year Plan to fulfill the plan for the sale of output and labor productivity growth and to increase production volume by R2.5 billion. Gross agricultural production output increased nearly 10 percent over the 5-year period.

There is no doubt that these are just the first steps; but they already bear witness to the existence of great reserves and opportunities, the initiation of whose use was generated by the decisions of the Central Committee April (1985) Plenum.

The steps which have been taken have improved the situation; but today we need a different kind of speed and a different way of measuring it, determined by the dynamism and dimension of affairs in the 12th 5-Year Plan and the tasks which are being discussed today at the party congress.

Proceeding from the instructions of the Central Committee report and the provisions of Comrade N.I. Ryzhkov's report on the Basic Guidelines for the economic and social development, the kray party organization is also faced with new, more crucial and more complex tasks. This is caused by the wealth and diversity of the kray's natural resources, whose assimilation requires a special approach. Here the distinguishing feature of the development of our national economy is a long-term, comprehensive approach in resolving economic and social tasks on the basis of the implementation of multitargeted and interconnected programs.

A very important issue in developing the kray's production forces in the 12th 5-Year Plan and for the period through 2000 is the creation, on the basis of the Kansk-Achinsk coal basin and the hydraulic resources of the Yensey and its tributaries, a powerful fuel and energy complex of all-union importance for the production of the country's cheapest electricity and coal, the further development of energy-intensive production facilities using local, highly effective timber and mineral and raw material resources, and the increased production of nonferrous metals and output of the in-depth processing of timber and coal and of the chemical industry and petrochemistry. Of course, work must be stepped up on the accelerated development of agro-industrial complex and the provision of transport and the abolition of disproportions in the development of individual sectors of the national economy.

The kray party organization is well aware that it must respond to the concern and attention of the party and government with specific deeds and the fulfillment of the set targets. The Communists are prepared for this.

The kray has developed a comprehensive program for the intensification of the economy on the basis of introducing the achievements of scientific-technical progress for the 12th 5-Year Plan and the period through 2000. It drew special attention to the speediest commissioning and assimilation of production capacities, the maximum loading of existing enterprises, and their modernization and retooling. It provides for the concentration of capital investments, the reduction of the number of projects under construction simultaneously and the time taken on construction, and the reduction of expenses. The consolidation of capital construction capacities remains one of the main questions for the kray party organization, because without this one cannot resolve the task of the accelerated development of the kray's production forces.

After criticism at the June conference, the USSR Gosplan, the USSR Ministry for the Construction of Heavy Industry Enterprises, and the USSR Ministry of Power and Electrification have finally recognized the need to develop the capacities of leading construction subdivisions in the kray. Although, as is well known, I am obliged to say even on this point that it is still a great step from recognition to practical implementation. That is why I should like to appeal once again primarily to the ministers — Comrades Bashilov and Mayorets — to take this step with us more rapidly.

As has been determined, we have not succeeded in achieving the accelerated creation of the Kansk-Achinsk fuel and energy complex. The USSR Ministry of Power and Electrification and the USSR Ministry of Light Industry have unjustifiably delayed the creation of the envisaged construction industry base at the Kansk-Achinsk fuel and energy complex [Katek], which makes it impossible to ensure the necessary development of the socio-consumer infrastructure and correspondingly create conditions for recruiting and keeping cadres.

It should also be noted that for our kray, where the level of concentration of heavy industry is particularly high, it is particularly important to implement environmental conservation measures. The work being done today is not effective enough and the nature utilization system is developing extensively, with an increase in waste products. With the formation of Katek, the discharge of pollutants into the atmosphere and water areas is increasing.

These problems require that the USSR Gosplan, the USSR Ministry of Power and Electrification, and the USSR Ministry of the Coal Industry, in conjunction with other ministries and departments and together with us, should immediately complete the development of an integral comprehensive program for the development of Katek for the long term. Here we must embark in earnest on its practical implementation.

Inasmuch as the formation and subsequent operation of Katek's projects affects the interests of several ministries, it is expedient to examine also questions of the effective and rational interdepartmental management of this complex. With the intensification of territorial influence on questions of economic and social development, economic management in general should be paid paramount attention. It is not simply a case of some kind of infringement of departmental rights but of sensible management with a consideration for the interests of the entire state.

For instance, in the kray there are about 15 associations and enterprises of the USSR Ministry of the Timber, Pulp and Paper and Wood Processing Industry, which are not subordinated to each other but which are technologically interconnected. The CPSU kraykom has to intervene constantly in their activity particularly on questions of collaboration. There is no way out, as they say. We have to engage in economic matters instead of party leadership. We have put these questions to the ministry, but we are told: "Specialization." Here it is not an interdepartmental mechanism of contradictions but departmentalism within one department which is operating. So by specialization is understood not technical and technological management but merely administrative management.

This applies not only to Katek, not only to the USSR Ministry of the Timber, Pulp and Paper, and Wood Processing Industry, and not only to our kray. That is why, in discussing the Basic Guidelines, it is also necessary to investigate and pay attention to questions of economic management.

We are also perturbed by the following problem. Geological science predicts considerable stocks of hydrocarbon raw material in the kray's subterranean depths. But oil and gas prospecting work is not being properly developed in our kray. Here too we need the aid of the USSR Gosplan and the USSR Ministry of Geology to examine and approve the relevant program of work.

The tasks of developing the production forces of all Siberia, including our kray, and making rational use of resources urgently dictate the need for a comprehensive approach to its solution. It is primarily a case of the extensive recruitment of cadres in Siberia and of keeping them there, of turning Siberia into a comfortable place for man to live. As yet social development lags behind economic development and the Siberians' standard of living, as has already been noted here, lags behind the average union level. As a result, the formation of new production collectives is being delayed and disproportions are arising in creating new cities.

The effectiveness of creating a production and social infrastructure with the group distribution of enterprises in industrial centers and territorial production complexes is obvious today, but there is no efficient economic mechanism for this process. That is why the ministries and departments are displaying a persistent reluctance to resolve these questions in conjunction with local organs; and through the fault of the USSR Gosplan, we are continuing to chase around soliciting allocations [doli] for these matters.

All these questions were mentioned in the Central Committee Political Report and they have been reflected in the new edition of the party program. This also places on us additional, weighty responsibility for their implementation.

Comrades! In seeking to neutralize the powerful magnetic force of the broad complex of Soviet peace-loving initiatives, the United States is again advancing to the fore the theme of so-called regional conflicts. For the occasion they have thought up the theory of "low-intensity warfare." On the one hand the theory is designed to justify imperialism's interference in the internal affairs of peoples defending their sovereign rights, and on the other to shift the blame for kindling dangerous hotbeds of crisis onto others. Mainly onto the USSR and its allies and friends. Thus they are trying to ascribe to the SRV, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, and the People's Republic of Kampuchea responsibility for maintaining tension in Southeast Asia. They thus want to discredit the courageous peoples of Indochina and to remove from the world public the memory of how Vietnam experienced to the full the burden of "high-intensity warfare" imposed on it by imperialism, primarily U.S. imperialism, and how their flames seared the earth of Laos and Combodia.

But it may be said that there is no fair wind for a wrecked ship, that is, for slanderous propaganda. The Indochinese countries' international prestige is growing. They are waging an active struggle for the normalization of the situation in Southeast Asia which the CPSU fully supports. The proposals of Vietnam, Laos, and Combodia to create a zone of peace, cooperation, and stability in this region are wholly consistent with Soviet initiatives to safeguard security in Asia.

Comrades! A businesslike mood, further headway on the path of restructuring, and explicit, harmonious work — those are the party's demands, those are the guidelines for our further activity in fulfilling the decisions of the 27th CPSU Congress and the 12th 5-Year Plan targets.

Today Lenin's appeal resounds with new force: We must make headway; we must look ahead, discard what is harmful, pool everything valuable in order to determine precisely a number of immediate practical measures, and implement them come what may. And this Leninist approach was manifested particularly graphically during the congress. It lies in dissatisfaction with the results achieved in economic and cultural building, in their realistic analysis, and, finally, in the constructive ways of resolving these difficult tasks in the 12th 5-Year plan and for the period through 2000.

This Leninist style of work by the Politburo and Central Committee is a great school and good example which will be followed by the Krasnoyarsk Kray party organizaton, doing everything to be a worthy detachment of our Communist Party, mobilizing the energy and all creative efforts of the working people to increase its contribution to the implementaton of the strategy of the acceleration of the country's socioeconomic development and the steady enhancement of its defense might. (applause)

SFRY's Dimce Belovski

PM031924 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 1 Mar 86 Second Edition p 10

["Speech by Comrade Dimce Belovski, Secretary of the LCY Central Committee Presidium" (PRAVDA headline) delivered at 27 February afternoon session of 27th CPSU Congress]

[Text] Comrades!

Comrade Gorbachev!

On behalf of the LCY and its Central Committee I convey greetings to the CPSU and the working class and all working people of the USSR. (applause) Along with these greetings I convey our sincere wishes for your country's all-around progress and prosperity and for the CPSU's new successes. (applause)

We are following with attention and interest the activity of your party and of the working class and all working people of the Soviet Union and the major reorganizations aimed at resolving urgent economic and social problems of development and finding answers to the demands and challenges of the modern epoch. We have been able to see for ourselves that you have advanced a number of important questions, seeking to open up scope for the Soviet Union's further all-around material and social progress and thereby making a contribution to enriching the path of socialism's development in the world.

We are following with respect and understanding the efforts, initiatives, and proposals of the Soviet Union and of Comrade Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, aimed at easing tension in the world, ending the arms race, removing the danger hanging over mankind, and also resolving other problems of the international community.

Like the entire Nonaligned Movement, we have always supported all constructive proposals and practical steps leading to the start of the disarmament process and the strengthening of peace and security throughout the world.

The times in which we live are complex and fraught with danger. World development is encountering great difficulties and is proceeding under conditions of the deepening conflict between the forces struggling for freedom, independence, equal rights, and social progress and the forces of class and national oppression, imperialism, hegemonism, and other kinds of supremacy. The existing system of international political and economic relations has long been incapable of embracing the processes of emancipation and democratization in the world and of ensuring regard for mankind's vital interests and aspirations for a world without weapons and wars and without the division of countries into rich and poor, for world peace and security, for peace on all national borders, for active peaceful coexistence and respect for national sovereignty, territorial integrity, and noninterference in other countries' affairs.

The modern world is deeply divided in the economic, ideological, political, and other spheres. It is going through great upheavals, as witnessed by the continuing arms race, local wars and military interventions, the policy of force, pressure, and interference in sovereign countries' internal affairs, and also by the deepening gulf between developed and developing countries. The increasingly grave economic position of the overwhelming majority of developing countries is not only an expression of inequitable relations in the world economy but also a political problem of very great international significance.

Thus, on the threshold of the new age we are encountering historic challenges demanding great responsibility. Socialism as a world process will continue to strengthen thanks, above all, to successes in the socialist countries' material and social development and to social transformations in other countries, thanks to the progress and the socialist orientation of countries which have embarked on the path of independence and self-determination. The magnetic force of socialism and its historic progressiveness stem precisely from the fact that it opens up new scope for social and national liberation, the liberation of the working class, the realization of democracy for the working people and for all citizens, and also the strengthening of cooperation among the peoples, equal rights among states, and the ensuring of peace throughout the world.

The meaning of socialism lies in constant breakthroughs across the uncharted frontiers of human freedom and well-being. Its might is the strength of united workers and their organizations, and its vitality lies in constant changes and in improvement. In this connection I would like to mention that Yugoslav Communists have noted in their program: "Nothing that has been created in the course of socialist building is so sacred that it cannot be surpassed and replaced by something new and more progressive."

Comrades! While paying tribute to the results you have achieved and also to the efforts being made for the further development of your society and your country, I wish to emphasize that the SFRY and our country's working class and working people headed by the LCY are struggling in the present complex and difficult international situation for the further successful development of the Yugoslav socialist revolution and for the prosperity of all our peoples and ethnic groups on the basis of the policy formulated by Tito of independence, nonalignment, and the active promotion of the democratization of international political and economic relations.

Our efforts today are aimed at creating conditions for the country's dynamic and stable economic growth and for the further development of socialist self-management so that the working class can in full measure exert a direct influence on the processes of decisionmaking and management not only in labor collectives but also in society as a whole; for strengthening the Yugoslav federation as an equitable community of peoples and ethnic groups, and their fraternity and unity; for the further enhancement of the LCY's ability to successfully and efficiently perform its leading ideological and political role in society under the new conditions.

Approaching its 13th congress, the LCY actively involves members of the League of Communists, the working class, working people, all citizens, and their organizations in activity in these strategic directions.

The SFRY actively participates in international relations, contributing to the development of equitable cooperation among countries and peoples. The policy of nonalignment, which has confirmed itself as an independent, autonomous, and global factor in international relations, is our long-term orientation on the international plane. It expresses the vital interests and the class-revolutionary foundations of our revolution and opens up broad opportunities for Yugoslavia to make a contribution to asserting peace, security, and equal rights in the world.

Comrades! We have always considered and consider now that the development of friendly Yugoslav-Soviet relations and equitable all-around cooperation accords with the interests of our countries and peoples and of peace and mutual understanding throughout the world. The foundations of our cooperation were laid in the joint struggle against fascism in the storms of World War II. (applause) The principal foundations of this cooperation were defined and elaborated in the Belgrade and Moscow declarations and in other joint documents. We are certain that all the conditions exist, despite the differences which there naturally are, for the continued broad development of our cooperation and friendship in our mutual interests, given mutual respect and observance of the principles of independence, sovereignty, and noninterference. With such cooperation we will make the best contribution to realizing the highest ideals of the working class and of all mankind in the struggle for peace, security, economic development, and socialism. (applause)

We wish all of you, dear comrades, and the 27th CPSU Congress successful work! Thank you very much. (prolonged applause, all rise)

MPRP's Batmonh

PM031501 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 1 Mar 86 Second Edition p 9

["Speech by Comrade Jambyn Batmonh, General Secretary of the MPRP Central Committee and Chairman of the Mongolian People's Great Hural Presidium" (PRAVDA headline) delivered at 27 February morning session of 27th CPSU Congress]

[Text] Dear Comrade Gorbachev!

Dear comrades!

Allow me, on behalf of Socialist Mongolia's Communists and working people, to cordially greet the delegates to the 27th CPSU Congress and, through them, all Soviet Communists and the great Soviet people and to wish the congress successful work. (applause)

It is a tremendous honor for the MPRP delegation to participate in the work of the forum of Soviet Communists, worthy heirs to great October, marching in the vanguard of the struggle for the triumph of the cause of peace and socialism.

These days the eyes of all the world's honest people are directed toward the Kremlin, where the 27th CPSU Congress is being held. The Mongolian people are following the work of the Leninist party's congress with profound interest and see it as an event of world significance. It was with tremendous attention and fraternal interest that we listened to the CPSU Central Committee Political Report delivered at the congress by Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee. It provides a comprehensively weighed assessment of the real results of the gigantic activity of the CPSU and the Soviet people and defines the clear and farsighted strategy of Soviet society's development on the basis of the radical acceleration of scientific and technical progress. The report makes an in-depth analysis of the modern world as a whole and of the international situation today and elaborates the principled foundations of a comprehensive system of international security. The creation of such a system would ensure lasting peace for present and future generations.

The communist frankness and exactingness of the assessments and conclusions both of the Central Committee Political Report and of the delegates' speeches and the truly innovative spirit and the businesslike atmosphere of all the congress' work leave an indelible impression. (applause) In this we see the Leninist party's strength, the might of its collective reason, the monolithicness of its ranks, and the Soviet Communists' indissoluble and strengthening unity with the people. (applause)

The documents being discussed at the 27th CPSU Congress are of great historic significance and constitute an excellent example of the creative development of Marxist-Leninist theoretical thought and a model of a scientific approach to resolving key questions of the USSR's internal development and central problems of international life.

These splendid documents gladden and inspire us, your close allies and comrades in the common struggle. (applause) The consistent implementation of the congress decisions will lead to the further dynamic growth of the economic, scientific, technical, and defense potential of the Soviet Union and the entire socialist community in the name of peace and progress and of ensuring socialism's victory in peaceful competition with capitalism.

The new edition of the CPSU Program, which generalizes the historical experience of building socialism in the USSR and the other fraternal countries and the experience of the entire world revolutionary movement, is an outstanding political document of the present day. It makes a tremendous contribution to the treasure house of Marxism-Leninism and provides a clear guideline for progress toward a bright communist future. The program arms Soviet Communists with an effective, scientifically substantiated strategy of the qualitative renewal of all aspects of the life of Soviet society. It is imbued with historical optimism and ardent humanism, with the desire to deliver mankind from the threat of nuclear death.

The Soviet Union's unswerving adherence to the cause of peace and the peoples' security, recorded in the CPSU Program, is already being confirmed by practical deeds. This is convincingly indicated by the congress documents and the USSR's new peace initiatives and proposals recently advanced by Comrade Gorbachev.

The Mongolian People's Republic [MPR] fully approves and resolutely supports these initiatives along with the fraternal socialist community countries and all the world's progressive, peace-loving forces. (applause)

The U.S. ruling circles counter the consistent policy of peace being pursued by the Soviet Union and the other fraternal socialist countries with a policy of escalating the unrestrained arms race and creating hotbeds of tension and conflict situations in the world, including in the Asian and Pacific region.

The MPR seeks to make its contribution to the fraternal socialist countries' joint efforts in the struggle for peace throughout the world and in Asia in particular. Our country has a vital interest in creating a sound security system on this continent on the basis of joint concord. It consistently supports the constructive proposals of the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries, as well as of the region's peace-loving states, to pool efforts so as to ensure reliable security throughout the Asian Continent and to prevent the forces of militarism and aggression from gaining the upper hand.

We are convinced that people who have managed to create a unique civilization on earth by their painstaking labor can and must defend it. Their strength lies in unbending determination to act together to preserve peace, in the name of saving civilization. (applause)

Comrades! Mongolian and Soviet Communists are forever cemented by unity of ideals and aims in the joint struggle. Our peoples are united by the indissoluble commonality of their historical destinies. This is the firm foundation of our traditional fraternal friendship. Being faithful to it means following the behests of the great Lenin and of Suhe-Baatar, leader of the Mongolian people's revolution, and indefatigably strengthening the internationalist relations between our parties, countries, and peoples.

Many generations of Mongolian and Soviet Communists and of our countries' peoples have done and are doing just this. (applause) Hence the great creative strength of our friendship, which we see as an effective guarantee of the burgeoning of socialist Mongolia and of its free and independent development. The Mongolian people are infinitely grateful for this to the great Soviet people and their Leninist party. (applause) The long-term program for the development of economic, scientific, and technical cooperation between the MPR and the USSR for the period through the year 2000 ushers in a qualitatively new stage in the further broadening and deepening of Mongolian-Soviet cooperation. The broad masses of our countries' working people, who have rich experience of joint work, will participate directly in realizing the program. I am pleased to point out that today many Mongolian-Soviet international teams and crews are working successfully on joint enterprises and in various sectors of our country's national economy under the motto "Two Congress — One Purpose." (applause)

Esteemed comrades! The Mongolian people are working selflessly to create the material and technical base of socialism. They have given an enthusiastic reception to the measures being implemented by the party which are aimed at strengthening discipline, order, and organization in all sectors, improving management and planning of the national economy, enhancing social production efficiency, and improving the quality of the work of all components of party, state, and economic organizations.

Underpinned by the economic potential created over the years of people's power with the help of the Soviet Union and the other fraternal socialist countries, the MPR has now completed its 7th 5-Year Plan with good results. In an atmosphere of the working people's growing political and labor activeness we are approaching the next, 19th MPRP Congress, which will be held in May of this year. It will sum up the work of the party and the people during the period under review and will outline new tasks of the country's economic and social development over the next few years.

In conclusion allow me to wholeheartedly wish Soviet Communists and the entire great Soviet people the successful fulfillment of the 27th CPSU Congress decisions and new achievements in the name of the ideals of communism and in the struggle for peace! (applause)

Long live the great Lenin's party — the CPSU! (applause)

May the unbreakable fraternal friendship of the Mongolian and Soviet peoples strengthen and flourish! (applause)

Long live peace throughout the world! (prolonged applause, all rise)

Angola's Dos Santos

["Speech by Comrade Jose Eduardo dos Santos (Chairman of the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola-Labor Party and President of the People's Republic of Angola)" (PRAVDA headline) delivered at the 27 February morning session of the 27th CPSU Congress]

[Text] Esteemed Comrade Gorbachev!

Esteemed comrade congress delegates!

Dear friends and comrades!

On behalf of the Angolan people and all members of the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola-Labor Party (MPLA-PT), allow me to extend to you warm greetings and sincere gratitude for the invitation to attend the 27th CPSU Congress. (applause)

Your congress is the start of a new stage which is of decisive significance for the development of the socialist community, for the socioeconomic progress of peoples, and for international detente and strengthening of world peace. Your party is determining the basic guidelines for Soviet social development over the next 15 years. It is striking evidence of enormous experience and of belief in the just nature of the ideals which all Soviet people are actively and consciously struggling to see triumph.

The new edition of the CPSU Program sets clear aims and defines the means of attaining them. It truly is a program for the planned and comprehensive improvement of socialism and for progress on the path to communism on the basis of acceleration of your country's socioeconomic development.

It is well known that since Great October all the successes achieved by the Soviet people under the party's leadership have made an impact beyond your county's geographical borders and have been of decisive significance for the progress of mankind as a whole. The October Revolution and the Soviet Union's decisive contribution to the victory over German fascism were a powerful stimulus to the liberation movement in our countries.

The 27th CPSU Congress is a continuation of these glorious traditions and it is an important new milestone in the process that began in 1917. The congress ensures the continuity of the selfless efforts by many generations of Soviet people to implement the teachings of the brilliant leader of the world proletariat, Vladimir Ilich Lenin. (applause)

Thanks to your active contributions and example the people's of the world are aware of the advantages of the socialist system as the only path that guarantees genuine independence and progress and the elimination of economic backwardness.

Dear comrades! Our party held its second congress 3 months ago, which summed up its activity over the 10 years Angola has been an independent and sovereign state and outlined concrete and realistic tasks on improving the well-being of the people's masses. The congress was a decisive step forward. It touched on socioeconomic as well as political questions; it defined the measures needed to strengthen the country's defense capability and security, and it resolutely reaffirmed our choice of socialism.

In conditions where the peoples of the world are gaining more and more victories, imperialism is responding with heightened aggression and direct interference in the internal affairs of sovereign states. And when it is unable to do this directly, it resorts to the services of puppets and people who are betraying their people and the cause of independence.

In southern Africa this role is performed, on the one hand, by racist South Africa, which is regularly carrying out aggression against states in the region in an effort to preserve the odious apartheid regime, and on the other hand, by the armed gangs of the puppets which, as South Africa's weapon, are sowing death and destruction, and are trying to prevent these countries from developing normally, by creating an atmosphere of instability and terror. This is the policy of diktat and state terrorism that the Pretoria rulers are constantly pursuing in respect to sovereign states in our region with the patronage and support of the present U.S. Administration, which managed to get the "Clark amendment" revoked and recently decided to give military, financial, and diplomatic aid to the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola — the puppet of South Africa.

We condemn this crude interference in the affairs of our independent and sovereign state and declare that our people, with weapons in their hands, will continue to repulse direct and indirect aggression in order to ensure the defense of the country and to protect the revolutionary gains. (applause)

So far all efforts to arrange a serious and constructive dialogue have failed because of the South African regime's reluctance and dishonesty. The peoples of southern Africa know that only by strengthening their defense capability can they wreck South Africa's aggressive plans. The Angolan people, who are the victims of endless aggression by that regime and by international imperialism, are constantly aware of the solidarity of the fraternal and friendly peoples and democratic and progressive organizations all over the world.

In this connection I particularly want to mention the socialist countries, above all the Soviet Union and Cuba. (applause) The long-standing ties of friendship and cooperation between our peoples are strengthening in the struggle to defend our national independence and the people's gains which are threatened by imperialism and its lackeys.

Our young republic will face serious tests in connection with the intensification of imperialism's aggressiveness and the deterioration of the international and economic situation. This prompts us, as it did when our revolution was having a difficult time, to ask all the fraternal parties and peace-loving and free peoples for moral and material support.

Dear comrades! All over the world — Latin America, the Middle East, Asia — imperialism is creating hotbeds of tension in order to preserve its privileges, thus aggravating the already wretched living conditions of the people's masses. In its effort to portray regional conflicts as a manifestation of global confrontation between East and West, the United States is brazenly interfering in the lives of other peoples and masquerading as a defender of democracy and freedom, which it is actually ignoring and violating.

It is clear to anyone who feels responsible for preserving world peace and for life on earth that only a policy of peaceful coexistence and mutual understanding between states and solidarity with all the peoples struggling against colonialism, Zionism, and racism can ensure the attainment of this lofty goal. We will always support the constructive policy of disarmament and peace conducted by the Soviet Union and we see it as a very important contribution to the cause of international detente and salvation of mankind from a new world war. (applause)

Comrade delegates! The rich content of theoretical thought and the thoroughness of the coverage of questions and solution of problems characteristic of Comrade Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev's report to the 27th CPSU Congress are proof of the enormous vitality of the CPSU which is leading the Soviet people to the building of a communist society.

The results of the congress will be another outstanding victory not only for the CPSU and Soviet people, but for all the peoples who hold dear the cause of peace, freedom, and progress. (applause)

Permit me, comrades, to wish your people future success.

Long live friendship between the Angolan and Soviet peoples! (applause)

Long live proletarian internationalism! (applause)

The struggle continues! Victory is certain! (prolonged applause, all rise)

Ethiopia's Mengistu

PM031120 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 1 Mar 86 Second Edition p 10

["Speech by Comrade Mengistu Haile Mariam, General Secretary of the Workers Party of Ethiopia Central Committee and Chairman of Socialist Ethiopia's Provisional Military Administrative Council" (PRAVDA headline) delivered at 28 February morning session of 27th CPSU Congress]

[Text] Dear Comrade Gorbachev!

Esteemed members of the Presidium!

Congress delegates! Comrades!

At this moment in history when the 27th Congress of the Leninist CPSU is being held, under whose leadership the socialist system, which has become an insuperable force in the world, won victory, I convey cordial greetings and best wishes to the Communists and the entire Soviet people from Ethiopia's revolutionaries and working people. (applause)

The October Revolution, which triumphed in Russia under the leadership of the vanguard Bolshevik Party and gave life to the world's first workers' and peasants' state, opened a new chapter in the history of social revolutions and the national liberation struggle. As a result of the socialist revolution in the land of the great Lenin, the Soviet State, which routed fascism in World War II and put a stop to imperialism's military supremacy, was created and strengthened. Socialism extended beyond the bounds of a single country. It put a stop to imperialism's atomic monopoly. It laid a reliable basis for boosting democratic and national liberation movements, giving a powerful boost to the further expansion of socialism's borders. It turned into a world system and played the decisive role in preserving peace.

Dear comrades! It is a tremendous honor and joy for us to attend this historic congress, which will adopt the new edition of the party program, which defines the strategy and tactics for improving socialism and progressing toward communism. The political line and economic tasks detailed in the Political Report delivered by Comrade Gorbachev envisage the acceleration of scientific and technical development and the country's socioeconomic progress, the strengthening of the party's leading role, and the creation of conditions for ensuring peace worldwide and the triumph of socialism. That is why we fully approve and support this course. (applause)

Today there is a real danger that the centuries-old achievement of human civilization may perish as a result of a nuclear catastrophe. That is why the desire for peace and detente has gripped all the peoples. We make a high assessment of Soviet peace-loving policy, which promotes the realization of mankind's dream of peace and of ensuring international security. The recent Soviet initiatives envisaging the reduction and phased elimination of nuclear weapons by the year 2000, the utilization of science and technology solely for peaceful space exploration in the interests of mankind, and the limitation of conventional arms have attracted attention and met with support from the socialist community and peace-loving forces in all corners of the world.

While the socialist countries are making constructive efforts to satisfy society's material and spiritual needs, imperialism, on the contrary, in its unchecked desire to accumulate deadly weapons, wants to turn space into an arena for military battles, which puts the world on the brink of a catastrophe. Imperialism's actions are no less alarming when it tries to torpedo the arms reduction talks that reflect the peoples' peaceful aspirations. It is whipping up tension in the countries of Africa, Asia, and Latin America, where revolutionary processes are developing. Bourgeois circles are trying to achieve military supremacy over socialism and hold back the spread of Marxist-Leninist ideology in the world.

Imperialism has sharply stepped up its insolent interference in the internal affairs of developing countries traveling the socialist path in an attempt to undermine the revolutionary process there and the struggle to eliminate oppression and exploitation. President Reagan's attempt in his speech devoted to the 40th anniversary of the United Nations to link the problem of universal peace with the state of affairs in Nicaragua, Afghanistan, Cambodia, Angola, and Ethiopia and his stubbornness over the question of giving all possible support to antipeople elements that are trying to hold back the revolution's development in these countries is graphic testimony that imperialism has currently focused main attention on those parts of the world in which revolutionary processes and national liberation movements are developing.

Dear congress participants! May I take this opportunity to reiterate — although Soviet Communists are well aware of this — that the problems which revolutionary processes are encountering in the developing countries, especially the African countries, are very complex. We have many enemies today and we have been forced to wage a struggle along many avenues. Like any country experiencing a social revolution, we are combating class enemies, reaction, colonialism, neocolonialism, imperialism, disease, poverty, illiteracy — in short, backwardness and the consequences of frequent natural disasters.

The shameful position of international imperialism, which remains deaf to the peoples' struggle against the racist South African regime and the world community's calls to put a stop to this inhuman regime, leads to a still greater complication of the situation in southern Africa. The facts are such that if imperialism has not yet attempted to wage nuclear war against us, it has unleashed overt international terror against those regions which, as I have already said, attract its particular attention. As a result, hundreds and thousands of us are dying every day, every hour, every minute. However, we realize that casualties are inevitable in the struggle for our ideals. Confidence in ultimate victory gives us the strength not to falter in the face of temporary difficulties.

Dear comrades! Revolutionary Ethiopia, accelerating its progress along the path of development that it has chosen and repulsing the onslaught of international imperialism and reaction, is making its own contribution to the cause of strengthening peace on the African Continent and in the region. Great work is under way to implement our party's program in various spheres. A no less important sector of our activity encompasses the efforts to fulfill the 10-year plan of economic and social development adopted by the Workers Party of Ethiopia Constituent Congress, which is to promote the Ethiopian people's overcoming of their economic backwardness and the creation of the necessary material and technical prerequisites for the transition to building socialism.

However, at the moment this work was launched, our country was hit by a drought. The struggle against the drought has diverted considerable forces away from the implementation of the tasks outlined by the 10-year plan. Alongside the provision of urgent aid to save the drought-stricken population we are pursuing a program of resettling inhabitants from drought-stricken areas to fertile land with a view to finally resolving the drought problem. Apart from the efforts in the struggle against backwardness and the consequences of natural disasters, in this short period we have succeeded under the nationwide slogan "One for all, all for one" in mobilizing the people to implement long-term creative plans. Everyday conscientious labor, the strengthening of discipline, the increasing of labor productivity, the saving of resources, and the realistic assessment of our possibilities have become the task of the day.

Ethiopia's working people, relying on the principle of proletarian internationalism and with the support of the great Soviet Union, are fully resolved to enthusiastically gain victory in this multifaceted revolutionary struggle.

Dear comrades! The aid imbued with the spirit of proletarian internationalism which the CPSU, the Soviet Government and people, and the other fraternal socialist countries are giving the Ethiopian people to overcome the consequences of the drought will have an important place in the history of our revolution. The extensive ties between revolutionary Ethiopia and the Soviet Union strengthen with every passing day. Our cooperation in various spheres has reached new impressive heights.

Dear congress participants! The Soviet Union's progress in the sphere of science, technology, and social and economic building accords with the development goals of all socialist and revolutionary forces. The comprehensive strengthening of the Soviet Union and the other socialist and progressive countries leads to the strengthening of the entire communist movement. We express sincere comradely wishes for the successful implementation of the decisions of the 27th CPSU Congress! (applause)

Long live Lenin's vanguard party! (applause)

Long live the great Soviet people! (applause)

Long live the friendship between the Workers Party of Ethiopia and the CPSU! (applause)

Long live proletarian internationalism! (prolonged applause, all rise)

PDRY's Al-Bayd

PM111020 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 6 Mar 86 Second Edition p 8

["Speech by Comrade 'Ali Salim al-Bayd (General Secretary of the Yemen Socialist Party Central Committee)" (PRAVDA headline) — date and place unspecified]

[Text] Dear comrades!

Speaking today from this rostrum, I am happy to convey to you, and through you to all Soviet Communists and people, militant greetings on behalf of the Yemen Socialist Party [YSP] Central Committee and to wish you successes in work.

Having listened to the CPSU Central Committee Political Report — this document of historic importance delivered by Comrade M.S. Gorbachev — we have had a marvelous opportunity to familiarize ourselves with the Soviet Union's constantly enriched experience in the sphere of party building, the political, economic, social, and ideological spheres, and scientific and technical development.

It would be no exaggeration to say that the Soviet Union's successes and achievements are a source of strength for the struggle of all peoples and all progressive forces striving to build a new world over which the banners of democracy, peace and socialism will fly, a world of prosperity free from wars, destruction, and other disasters.

The Political Report to the congress contains bold critical assessments. This reflects the healthy life-giving atmosphere in the CPSU and the party's ability to provide a correct analysis of new questions posed by life, to correctly assess practical experience, to draw lessons from it, and to set tasks for the future. This critical analysis is an important factor in renewing the forces of the party of the working class and the guarantee of the strengthening of the link between theory and practice and the achievement of unity between words and deeds.

On behalf of our party and people we state our support for the principled internationalist policy pursued by the CPSU, a policy which promotes the strengthening of security and stability in the world and the triumph of justice for all states and peoples.

I would particularly like to note the Soviet Union's internationalist solidarity with our country and the very extensive aid to our party and people in developing revolutionary practice and strengthening the socialist orientation.

We welcome the Soviet Union's support for the rights and just cause of the Arab peoples, and primarily the Arab people of Palestine, and the constructive Soviet proposals to resolve the Near East conflict.

We reaffirm our principled solidarity with the Palestinian people's struggle against various capitulationist plans aimed at eliminating the Palestinian problem. We express once again our solidarity with Syria, Libya, and Algeria, which firmly oppose the aggressive onslaughts of the forces of imperialism, Zionism, and reaction, and with the struggle of the Lebanese people and their progressive and patriotic forces to end the Israeli occupation and restore the unity, independence, and Arab nature of Lebanon.

Comrades! The liberated countries, first and foremost those of a socialist orientation, are developing under exceptionally complex conditions. They themselves and the choice of a progressive ideology that they have made serve as a target for attacks, subversive actions, and plots. The forces of imperialism and reaction and neocolonialist circles and their lackeys try to prove the impossibility of building socialism in the young liberated countries, and claim that there is no class struggle there, just struggle between ethnic groups, tribes, and clans.

Our party and the working people's power in our country have also been the target for plots and aggressive acts aimed at stopping the development of the 14 October national democratic revolution and ensuring a move away from a socialist course. That was the aim of the 13 January attempted putsch prepared by 'Ali Nasir Muhammad. It took the form of the mass killing of tried and tested leaders of the party and revolution and experienced party workers and sabotage at enterprises and led to the undermining of the people's national unity.

On this pretext imperialist circles and reaction unleashed a feverish propaganda campaign which, using well-rehearsed techniques, aimed to cast doubt on the correctness of the class choice we had made and our ideology.

However, our party emerged victorious in the struggle against the enemies' dangerous intrigues, which found expression in the bloody events of 13 January. This victory was won thanks to the conscious and resolute rebuff from party members, the working and peasant masses, and all working people. The firm internationalist position of the Soviet Union was a great support for the YSP and Democratic Yemen.

Stating the high assessment made by our party and the PDRY's working people of this immense support and international aid given by the Soviet Union to our country in all spheres, we reaffirm at the same time our resolve to step up our struggle and mobilize all our combat energy to stabilize the situation, which has deteriorated as a result of the plot, to eliminate its consequences, to heal wounds, to strengthen the unity of party and people, to continue progress along the socialist path, and to step up the effectiveness of our peace-loving foreign policy, which is being built in accordance with party resolutions and on the principles of international solidarity and peaceful coexistence. Our country will continue to deepen the friendly relations with the Soviet Union — relations that are strategic in nature — in line with the 1979 Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation between our countries. We will also strengthen ties with the other socialist countries on the basis of the commonality of our goals and the great ideas of scientific socialism and proletarian internationalism.

We will develop relations with all Arab and other neighboring countries on the basis of mutual respect, cooperation, noninterference in internal affairs, and anti-imperialist and anti-Zionist Arab solidarity. We will expand ties with all countries on the basis of the principles of peaceful coexistence in the interests of maintaining international security.

Comrades! Our presence at the congress exemplifies the strength of the militant international ties between our countries' parties and friendly peoples.

Long live the 27th CPSU Congress!

Long live the firm strategic alliance between the CPSU and the YSP!

May the banner of scientific socialism and proletarian internationalism be raised high! (prolonged applause)

Gorbachev Address Notes Responsibilities of Media

PM151525 Moscow KRASNAYA ZVEZDA in Russian 15 Mar 86 Second Edition p 1

[TASS report: "Meeting at the CPSU Central Committee"]

[Text] There has been a meeting in the CPSU Central Committee with leaders of mass information and propaganda organs. They discussed the immediate tasks of the Soviet press, television, and radio ensuing from the decisions of the 27th CPSU Congress. The participants in the meeting were addressed by Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee.

He stressed that the congress answered questions posed by life itself and armed the party and people with programmatic documents and the strategy of acceleration at a new turning point in the development of Soviet society. At the congress, complete approval was given to the line of the Central Committee's April Plenum. The main thing today is not just to maintain the atmosphere created by the congress, but to develop it in every way, to enrich it, to saturate it with ideas and deeds, and to hold a frank and direct conversation in the press about ways to implement the decisions of the 27th CPSU Congress. More practical deeds and initiative! Fewer empty words and enthusiastic exclamations!

It is essential to concentrate organizational and political work on the fullfilment of the plans for 1986 and the 12th 5-year period as a whole. The consistent solution of questions connected with the improvement of the economic mechanism and management, the acceleration of scientific and technical progress, the introduction everywhere of self-financing [khozraschet], the struggle for a high quality of output and of work in general and for the complete utilization of resources, and the strengthening of labor, production, and contract discipline — such are the main directions in the economic sphere.

In their letters to the CPSU Central Committee and to editorial offices, the working people support the measures for bringing about order and fighting drunkenness, alcoholism, and various negative phenomena. The scale and novelty of the work ahead is such that it demands a radical change in thinking by all — from ordinary worker to minister — and an improvement in the work style as a whole. Here the main enemy is bureaucratism and the press must castigate it persistently. The party is confident, Comrade Gorbachev stressed, that the press will work vigorously and thoroughly in this direction. Its entire activity must be subordinated to the idea of acceleration. Life itself must pulsate in the pages of newspapers and in television and radio programs, with the working people themselves speaking in their own language about the new things entering our reality, about their concerns and thoughts.

The press can do much to allow people's talents to shine through, to uncover their creative potential, and to actively support the masses' initiative.

An invaluable role belongs to our mass media in implementing the party's social program. This is no easy matter. It demands the attention of party organizations and all state and public organizations. But it is a matter of extraordinary importance, for it directly affects man — his life, his work, and his position in society. That is why the attention of the press to the whole complex of social problems must be a daily — I would say urgent — matter. This subject deserves to be a daily presence in the pages of the press.

Another matter about which particular mention should be made is the further development of the political system of our state and the comprehensive improvement and deepening of the democratic foundations of socialist life. Essentially, socialism cannot exist without democracy. Equally, true democracy is unthinkable without socialism. It is that indissoluble link that we must show in all its broadness. In this connection, it must be said that our mass media are also one of the most vivid manifestations of socialist democracy. It would be difficult to find a state outside the socialist system where the most acute problems of life were discussed in the press, television, and radio in such an acute, frank, sincere, and interested way. That is indeed socialist democracy in action.

This atmosphere created by the congress must be developed further. The spirit of constructiveness and a critical and self-critical attitude to things must be strengthened, sweeping aside all complacency, infatuation with success, and so forth. That is not the path for us. There now is no other more urgent and vitally important task than to gather the grains of that experience that is born of life, experience which aims to solve problems of accelerating the country's social and economic development. We have a strategic aim. We know full well what to do and what targets to strive for, but what we need today is practical work experience in every area, be it production, management, the work of a public organization, the economic mechanism, or party activity. There is not, nor can there be, anything richer than man's social experience. Thus, it is necessary for our press, radio, and television to become the true platform of that experience. It is necessary to work to ensure that the press reflects in an accurate, insistent, persistent, and comprehensive way the creative initiative of people which aims to solve our strategic problems and routine tasks.

With all their hearts the Soviet people approve the work of the party to improve the moral climate in the country and assert the norms of communist morality. Much here also depends on attention to the family and rearing of children. Our press, literature, and art should foster the strengthening of the family. Generally speaking, concern for people, the social sphere should be in the foreground, on at least equal footing with production.

The acceleration of economic development and the improvement of the conditions of the people's life can be ensured only by intensive and high-quality work by all people. We are living in a very interesting, difficult, and severe time. Work and work yet again — this is the need of the day. It is necessary to fight, to fight literally for each line of the party congress resolutions. Hard, daily control of the fullfilment of plans and targets is one of the most important tasks of the press. The class opponents are unleashing everything in order to sow disbelief in the practicability of the implementation of our plans. Such intrigues are opposed by our work, the mighty potential, enthusiasm, and patriotism of the Soviet people. The country's foreign policy, the party's course in international affairs — which was worked out by the 27th Congress — is in the closest possible way connected with internal policy. They are subordinated to one aim: to the interests of strengthening socialism, to the interests of working people, to the interests of international peace. This truth has to be delivered to all people on earth.

Participating in the exchange of opinions were Afanasyev, PRAVDA editor in chief; Gribachev, editor in chief of the journal SOVETSKIY SOYUZ; Laptev, IZVESTIYA editor in chief; Aksenov, chairman of the USSR State Committee for Television and Radio Broadcasting; Falin, chairman of the board of NOVOSTI PRESS AGENCY; Losev, TASS director general; Vladimirov, editor in chief of EKONOMICHESKAYA GAZETA; Baranov, editor in chief of SOTSIALISTICHESKAYA INDUSTRIYA; Fedotova, ediotor in chief of SOVETSKAYA ZHENSHCHINA magazine.

Comrade Ligachev, member of the politburo and secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, and Comrade Yakovlev, secretary of the CPSU Central Committee participated in the meeting.

Yurchenko Interviewed at Foreign Ministry by FRG TV

AU142020 Paris AFP in English 2017 GMT 14 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow, March 14 (AFP) — KGB officer Vitaliy Yurchenko, who defected to the West and then returned to the Soviet Union, was interviewed Friday in a bar of the Foreign Ministry here by a West German television journalist. "I am alive and well," he said, offering to show his identity papers and be filmed in the Foreign Ministry press center where he was having a drink at the bar.

Western press reports in the last 10 days had reported that he had been executed. But Soviet Embassies in Washington and Bonn said Monday that he was alive and well and working in Moscow. Mr. Yurchenko, a senior KGB official, defected to the West last August in Rome. He then went to the United States where, in November, he took refuge in the Soviet Embassy and asked to return to his country, claiming that the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency had drugged and kidnapped him.

Cyclone Hits Sakhalin With Heavy Snow, Strong Winds

LD170600 Moscow Domestic Service in Russian 0540 GMT 17 Mar 86

[Text] A severe onslaught of the elements is currently afflicting the inhabitants of Sakhalin Island. A large cyclone, which shifted here yesterday from the Sea of Japan, has caused storm winds on the island with hurricane-force gusts, heavy snowfalls, and massive snow avalanches. In individual regions the equivalent of 2 months' average precipitation has fallen in 24 hours. Airports are closed, trains have stopped, and traffic on the roads has been disrupted. Six administrative regions are in the area of the natural disaster. The oblast organizations, the permanent acting staff for dealing with the elements, labor collectives, and the entire population of the oblast are exerting vigorous efforts to reduce possible damage, avert casualties, and prevent interruptions to vital economic establishments. Repair and rescue detachments and first aid services are fully prepared in the most difficult areas; all available snow-clearing equipment is working continuously. Particular attention is being devoted to clearing streets and approaches to shops, schools, hospitals, and livestock-raising premises. The battle between the inhabitants of the island and the elements is continuing. In Sakhalin today, there is heavy snow, blizzards, the wind is 25-30 meters per second, and the temperature is minus 2 to minus 7.

Aliyev Discusses Aims of Congressional Programs

AU112018 Sofia TRUD in Bulgarian 3 Mar 86 p 1, 3

["Interview given by Geydar Aliyev, member of the CPSU Central Committee and first deputy chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers, to Raycho Radulov, TRUD correspondent in the USSR," "a few days ago" in Moscow: "With the fervor of Socialist Morality and Justice" — first paragraph is Radulov's introduction]

[Text] The work of the 27th CPSU Congress is the center of attention for the Soviet people and the whole world public. The contents of the Political Report by Mikhail Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, and of the main documents are profoundly and scientifically based on the party's higher aims and on the key questions of the party's general development in the field of internal and foreign policy. The accelerated social development of Soviet society and the social aspects of the price policy were among the concrete questions which I put to Geydar Aliyev, member of the CPSU Central Committee Politburo and first deputy premier of the USSR Council of Ministers, at a meeting which took place a few days ago. In his replies, Comrade Geydar Aliyev dwelt in detail on the CPSU's social strategy and on the grandiose plans which will be implemented in the course of the next three 5-year plan periods:

"Undoubtedly time will reveal even more fully the grandeur of the ideas raised at the congress and of the projected plans, but even now it can be said that in the history of our party and the fate of the Soviet people, the 27th CPSU Congress is an historic event of vast significance, an event which really is in the nature of a turning point, a new stage.

"The CPSU Central Committee has proposed for discussion by the congress delegates a program for the dynamic development of Soviet society, which meets the requirement for our country to be elevated to qualitatively new heights in economic, social, and spiritual progress. I particularly want to stress this feature, which is of fundamental importance for an understanding of everything which is happening now in the Soviet Union.

"Ten months ago, in April 1985, a CPSU Central Committee plenum was held which inaugurated the party's course today — a course of accelerating the country's socioeconomic development. Now, at the congress this course is being further developed; it is being defined in concrete form and its key tasks and the paths and means for attaining its goals are being defined and refined. As a result of a comprehensive analysis of the lessons drawn from previous development and of the historical situation, the party has proposed a clear, profoundly thought out, and graphically outlined strategy. This strategy touches on all spheres of our life, including the exceptionally important social field. I must say that perhaps no other CPSU congress has examined the issues of social policy in such an exacting, strict, and at the same time, broadly constructive manner.

"What is the reason? What has prompted us toward this?

"First, it is precisely in the sphere of social relations that the humane nature of the socialist order is manifested most vividly. It is precisely here that the higher aim of socialism is given material form and the economic activity which affects the workers' vital interests is realized.

"Second, our party's Central Committee considers that in recent years there has been an underestimation on the part of the central and local organs of authority of the ripe issues in the social sphere and in the consolidation of its material base. This contradicts the postulate of intensifying the social orientation of the economy and of raising the material prosperity and cultural level of the Soviet people; the end result is having a negative effect on solving the problems of production.

"At the CPSU Central Committee congress, a long-term, overall, and socially strong policy is being promulgated which encompasses all fields of human life — from labor and everyday living conditions, health, and recreation to social and national relations. I will mention certain of its more important tasks which are of fundamental significance at the moment:

"At the party congress the goal has been set to raise the people's propserity to a qualitatively new level. What does this mean in concrete terms?

"During the coming 15 years it is planned to double the volume of resources directed toward improving living conditions. Per capita real incomes will increase by a factor of 1.6 to 1.8. During the next three 5-year-plan periods the real growth of incomes will be approximately the same as during the last 40 years. Immense state resources are being directed toward expanding housing and sociocultural construction. For example, we have set ourselves the task by the end of the century of building at least 2 billion square meters of housing accommodations and of providing every Soviet family with its own house or separate apartment.

"In answer to your question concerning retail prices, I can state that our approach toward this problem has been defined. As you know, in the Soviet Union the retail prices are stable as compared to many other countries. We are striving to maintain this stability and are adopting measures to ensure that the retail prices correspond to our orientation toward a steady increase in the workers' prosperity.

"You know that the prices of many food products in the Soviet Union have been stable for decades. For example, since 1955 the prices of bread, flour, sugar, and certain other essential foods have not changed. Since 1962 the prices of meat and milk — that is, of those goods which people use every day — have been stable. Naturally, this creates conditions for a continuous increase in the Soviet people's living standard and their material and spiritual prosperity.

"However, there are cases where we are moving toward increasing the prices of goods which are not essential. You know that we have increased the prices of jewelry articles, gold, glass crystal, and certain everyday articles, such as fashionable tailored goods and footwear. But these are goods which are not widely used. Thus, we have a strict approach and are maintaining strict control in regard to the problem of prices; this always allows us to implement a continuous growth of Soviet living standards.

"Much remains to be done in order to saturate the market with various goods and services, moreover, of high quality. For the present, a disproportion is being maintained between the demand and supply of goods and services. As a result of the planned measures, this disproportion is to be eliminated.

"Of course, the social policy promulgated at the congress is not limited solely to the task of increasing the people's material prosperity. In this 5-year plan, a broad complex of measures will be implemented in the longer term, aimed at satisfying the Soviet people's social and spiritual requirements more fully. The state system of free national education will be further developed. During the 12th 5-Year Plan period alone, it is planned to build schools for 7 million pupils and children's preschool establishments with 3 million places. The need for kindergardens will be satisfied within the next few years.

"Considerable means are being allocated to improving health care and the conditions for workers' recreation. It is planned to expand construction of new hospitals and polyclinics and, chiefly, to raise the quality of medical services. Ever more favorable conditions are being created for engaging in physical education and sport, for amateur art activities, and for technological creativity. These and other measures will be implemented at the expense of the social funds for consumption, which will be doubled by the year 2000.

"In the Political Report, the task of improving the people's life is inseparably linked with overcoming leveling in wages and salaries. This is in accordance with the essence of the basic principle of socialism, 'from each according to his abilities, to each according to his work.' The CPSU Central Committee completely supports the proposal to strengthen the control over labor productivity and consumption.

"The need to implement measures in the very near future against parasites, bribe-takers, and squanders of socialist property is accepted. In our society, where social justice is one of the highest values, a necessary function of our social policy is the just distribution of wealth. We are now placing at the foundation of our policy in the field of wages a stricter relationship between pay scales and remuneration and labor productivity. During the 12th 5-Year Plan period, wages in the production sphere will increase by 25 to 30 percent, whereas the increase for engineers and designers will be greater, constituting 30 to 35 percent.

"The new feature is that the wages of workers and employees in the production branches will, for the first time, increase on a mass scale at the cost of the means produced by the enterprises themselves — primarily, through savings in the 'Wages' fund and the release of workers, who will be given the opportunity to work in other sectors.

"As regards the nonproductive sphere, here the increase in working wages will be implemented at the expense of state means. It is planned to complete measures to increase the salaries of teachers and other workers in national education. The salaries of 5 million doctors, nurses, and other health service employees will be increased. There will also be increases in the wages of certain categories of workers in higher educational and cultural institutions.

"To give a succint definition of the party's current social policy: It consists of creating the best conditions for the harmonious development of the individual and for the full expression of every citizen's creative abilities. Everything that is planned in the social sphere — and this is emphasized in the Political Report — is realistic and realizable.

"This confidence of ours is inspired by those visible and encouraging changes which are already taking place in our society. They are expressed primarily in accelerated economic development. Judging from the results of the first months of 1986, we are moving ahead at even higher rates than those envisaged in the plan.

"Our confidence is also supported by the real change in the consciousness of millions of people, who are expressing mass approval and support for all of the party's steps aimed at the country's accelerated development. The Soviet people welcome the broad renewal currently taking place in our society and are filled with determination to support it with unselfish, effective labor.

"I wish to conclude with the words of Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev, spoken at the party congress: 'The irrepressible flow of history has already rushed to the watershed between the second and third millennia. What will happen further on there, on the other side of this watershed? We will make no prophecies. But we know that the plans which we are building are no ordinary ones. They are bold and our everyday deeds are permeated with the fervor of socialist morality and justice.'"

Congress Results Provide Stimulus for Future

[Editorial: "We View the Future With Confidence"]

[Text] There are special, unforgettable days in the life of society, when the usual course of events becomes incredibly concentrated. The compact moments of time, as it were, store up the country's energy and intellect, revealing its collective will. This is how one will remember the 10 days of the 27th party congress — a historic landmark, the beginning of a new chapter in our socialist life. And although we all witnessed and participated in those 10 days, each of us has yet to assess — not through the hurried lines of newspapers or through a rapid sequence of television pictures, but through the inner workings of the soul — the full significance of this very important event, all the boldness and innovativeness in the party decisions of the congress.

Yes, boldness and innovativeness! You pore over the CPSU Central Committee Political Report, the new edition of the CPSU Program and the CPSU Statutes, and the Basic Guidelines for National Economic Development in the 5-Year plan and beyond, you remember the delegates' speeches, you consider the authoritative points in the congress resolutions... Throughout the 10 days the party's collective thought pondered the essential and strategically vital problems of the country and the world. What would Soviet society be like as it entered the 21st century? What would be socialism's complexion and stance in the international arena? What future lies in store for mankind? All honest people in the world are unanimous: The Soviet Communists' replies to these questions are utterly realistic and optimistic. Direct, honest analysis of the ground covered and a confident view of the future, honed in the laboratory of Marxist-Leninist thought, were prominent features of the congress' work style.

Summing up the congress work, we note with satisfaction the atmosphere of high principle in which the discussion of party tasks took place and the cohesion and unity of views on all questions under discussion. Bolshevist truth and exactingness, the public exposure of shortcomings and omissions, and the in-depth analysis of the conditions of our society's development met with the unanimous approval of Communists and all Soviet people. The congress demonstrated with the utmost clarity that our party's bolshevist ability to learn correct lessons from past experience, find effective ways of solving urgent problems, and overcome anything obsolete that is hampering progress is once again making its presence felt at the current crucial stage.

The congress fully supported the line put forward at the April Plenum of accelerating the country's socioeconomic development and strengthening world peace. Its adoption and ratification were the chief political result of the 27th CPSU Congress, Comrade M.S. Gorbachev stressed in his speech at the closing of the congress. The improvement of socialism's economic system, the pursuit of an active and strong social policy, the deepening of democratism in all spheres of our society, and a close link between ideological and organizational work and the real problems of life — these are the main goals of the party's acceleration strategy.

There remains the paramount task of implementing the party's modern agrarian policy and implementing the USSR Food Program in order to substantially improve food supplies for the population in the 12th 5-Year Plan.

Complex tasks requiring a great deal of work... Their fulfillment will require not only the restructuring of economic thought and the abandonment of established stereotypes, but the maximum mobilization of available reserves, strengthening of organization and discipline, and eradication of mismanagement. A persistent, day-to-day struggle to improve quality must be waged by every Communist and by all working people — this is written in the 27th party congress' Resolution on the CPSU Central Committee Political Report.

Naturally, the acceleration course is not just a matter of economic transformations. It is also a program for improving the people's well-being, an uncompromising struggle against unearned income, the filling of the market with high-quality goods and services, and further work on the solution of the housing problem — in short, a whole complex of measures on improving people's lives.

Yes, for Lenin's party there is no goal more significant than Soviet people's welfare and happiness. This is confirmed by the congress decisions concerning fundamental changes in the content of labor, the creation of an integrated system of continuous education, health protection, the development of mass physical culture and sport, and the provision of interesting recreation for the population.

The Soviet Communists' social policy is based on meticulous consideration of the interests of classes and social groups as an essential condition of the strong unity of socialist society. The congress reemphasized the working class' vanguard role in this unity and pointed out the need to ensure its leading role and the all-around strengthening of the alliance of working class, kolkhoz peasantry, and labor intelligentsia.

The socialist way of life presupposes to an equal degree the establishment of collectivism and the creation of opportunities for the development of the individual. Concern for molding the individual, the congress decisions stress, demands the implementation of measures to further strengthen the family, increase parents' responsibility for the education of children, improve women's labor and everyday life, and pay daily attention to vetarans.

National relations are an important sphere of party social policy. The congress demanded special sensitivity and care in all things affecting national interests and feelings and called for a principled struggle against all manifestations of parochialism, nationalism, and chauvinism and for the strengthening of fraternal friendship among the peoples of our multinational country.

"Living, creative socialism is the creation of the people's masses themselves." Guided by this instruction by V.I. Lenin, the 27th CPSU Congress paid the closest attention to questions of improving representative and direct democracy and creating conditions for the consistent deepening of the people's socialist self-management.

With the development of direct democracy in mind, the party congress stressed that the labor collective has a tremendous part to play here and it demanded a cardinal improvement in the mechanism of the practical implementation of the democratic principles and norms enshrined in the Law on Labor Collectives, a wider range of questions on which labor collectives' decisions are final, a bigger role for general meetings of workers and employees, and greater responsibility for the fulfillment of their decisions.

The congress resolutely rejected the unseemly practice of keeping quiet about shortcomings and demanded general implementation of the Leninist principle that Communists need the truth always and in all circumstances. That is why, in the development of socialist democracy, fundamental significance is attached to broadening publicity in the activity of state and other bodies, without which the political creativity of the masses and their participation in management is impossible.

"The party's strength," the Central Committee Political Report stressed, "lies in the fact that it has a sense of the times, it can feel the pulse of life, and it is always operating in the masses' midst." With more than 19 million Communists in its ranks, the CPSU is guided in its activity by proven bolshevist principles. They govern the restructuring of party work now underway and demand the generation in every party organization of an atmosphere of creativity, exactingness, and self-criticism and a quest for effective new solutions for the problems being posed by life.

It would be naive to think that the need to restructure has already been recognized by everyone everywhere. In view of this, the congress demanded that party committees make a more resolute effort to eradicate all manifestations of stagnation and conservatism. It should be an absolute rule in party work, the 27th CPSU Congress resolution on the party Central Committee Political Report says, that one speak plainly, express all opinions openly, provide superior party bodies and the masses with objective information, and always display a high degree of exactingness and honesty in all things. Ostentation, complacency, efforts to suppress criticism, and work stagnation are incompatible with the modern style of party work. No leader of any rank should shirk responsibility for his actions and deeds.

The honest and pure face of the party members... This topic, raised in M.S. Gorbachev's report, set the tone for speeches by many delegates. Party membership must not be open to people who are joining for careerist reasons, who are seeking advantages in terms of obtaining the good things of life. The congress placed special emphasis on Lenin's idea that a party member has no privileges, just additional duties. And the party will judge a Communist's vanguard role not by words, but by deeds alone. Flattery, servility, and toadyism are fundamentally alien to the party member's makeup; his characteristics are principledness, modesty, self-criticism, and absolute devotion to the cause.

As is known, after the CPSU Central Committee April Plenum many areas of party, state, and economic work were fortified with vigorous, well-trained cadres; workers who had compromised themselves or fallen behind modern demands were replaced. The congress unanimously approved these measures and made it incumbent on party bodies to consistently and persistently continue conducting a principled cadre policy, waging a resolute struggle against habitual irresponsibility and the attitude that anything goes, against instances of violation of party and state discipline, and against all manifestations of red tape. Ideological steadfastness, high political standards, competence, the ability to organize collective work and inspire people by personal example, loyalty to principles, firm moral beliefs, and the constant need to communicate with the masses and to be immersed in the people's interests and needs — these are the traits of the true leader, as seen by the congress.

Truth is verified by action — this idea, expressed at the 27th CPSU Congress, is addressed today to every party member and to every Soviet person. We all have to not only perceive the essential meaning and spirit of the congress decision, not only understand its fundamental theses, but also put the party decisions into practice in all our work. Under the party's leadership and with the party we will carry out the instructions issued at the closing of the congress: "Turn the energy of intentions into the energy of concrete action." We have reliable guidelines and a reliable foundation. "We view the future with confidence, because we have a clear sight of our tasks and the ways of carrying them out," M.S. Gorbachev said at the congress. "We view the future with confidence, because we have the powerful backing of the people. We view the future with confidence because we are acting in the interests of the socialist homeland and the great ideals which the Communist Party is dedicated to serving selflessly." The congress' 10 days of work have strengthened this confidence of ours and have been a powerful stimulus to new labor accomplishments.

Uzbek Party Bureau Debates Priority Tasks

[Text] During its regular session, the Uzbek Communist Party Central Committee Bureau discussed a number of the priority tasks for party, soviet, communal, and economic organizations concerning the realization of the decisions adopted by the 27th CPSU Congress. The context and spirit of the recommendations made by the 27th congress must be conveyed to each and every party organization, communist, and individual. It is necessary to draw up concrete organizational, economic, and mass political measures in every corner in the near future and to organize work to accurately and successfully realize them. Following the 27th CPSU congress, there is a need for creating a strong desire for work in all of the republic's agricultural domains, making normal work conditions available, creating a positive and [word indistinct] work system, encouraging the initiatives of workers, and creating conditions to facilitate mutual demand and criticism.

In light of the decision adopted by the CPSU Central Committee and the USSR Council of Ministers concerning the measures required to further consolidate the consumers' cooperative societies, the meeting established practical measures for further consolidating and developing the work of the republic's consumers' cooperative societies and increasing their role in the effort made to realize social and economic tasks in rural regions.

It assigned the Uzbek SSR Union of Consumers' Societies and the Kara-Kalpak ASSR and the Kara-Kalpak Oblast consumers' unions the task of carrying out intensive and consistent work to upgrade the purchase and registration of agricultural products and raw materials, realize the complex program related to the question of fulfilling the food program, develop the production of consumer goods, improve the services domain, and make every kind of contribution toward the social and cultural changes in rural regions. The decision made in this regard also considered the further consolidation of the material and technical structure of the organizations and factories affiliated to the consumers' cooperative societies and the wide-scale application of contemporary scientific and technical discoveries and up-to-date experience to their work practices.

Various tasks were also assigned to the republic's local soviet executive committees, ministries, and administrations. The party organizations were advised to help the primary party organizations select and appoint cadres for the work collectives, increase their attention on matters related to organizational and mass political work, and mobilize employees affiliated to the consumers' cooperative societies in order to successfully realize the tasks established by the party.

Discussed at the meeting was the work carried out by the (Zalin) Rayon Party Committee to realize the decisions adopted by the 21st Uzbek Communist Party Central Committee Plenum on facilitating a cohesive livestock breeding industry and increasing livestock breeding products. It was established that the organizational and political work carried out by the rayon party committee and its bureau to give guidance on livestock breeding and increasing production (?in firms) has been inconsistent. The Uzbek Communist Party Central Committee Bureau requested that the (Zalin) Rayon Party Committee and Comrade Sahib Nazarov, first secretary of the (Zalin) Rayon Party Committee, take concrete measures to increase the accountability of the primary party organizations, leaders, and experts of the sovkhozes concerning the situation of work in livestock breeding, exercising perseverance in this economic domain, and completely revising work.

The State Committee for the Agro-Industrial Complex, the [word indistinct] Central Asian Division, and ministries and administrations were asked to give practical aid to the rayon establishments to focus significant attention on the question of appointing Communists, facilitating their vanguard role in production, and organizing socialist competitions among the livestock breeders.

Approved at the meeting were the measures taken by the Uzbek Communist Party Central Committee to realize the critical views, requests, and criticims put forward by Communists during the party report back and election meetings, conferences, and the 21st Uzbek Communist Party Congress. The ways and means of controlling the effort made in that regard were established.

Also discussed at the meeting were other matters related to the question of guidance for the economic field and for organizational and political work. Relevant decisions were adopted.

Aliyev Explains Role of Youth in Soviet Society

[From the "World and Youth" program]

[Text] During the 27th CPSU Congress, Soviet and foreign journalists met Geydar Aliyevich Aliyev, member of the CPSU Central Committee Politburo, who headed the commission for marking International Youth Year in our country. It is only natural that many of the questions dealt, in one way or another, with the lives of Soviet young people. "World and Youth" cameras were there.

[Begin recording][Aliyev] We regard it as particularly necessary to note the role of young people in carrying out work on major construction projects and opening up of new areas and regions of our country: The Far East, Siberia, and the north. For instance, everyone must be aware of the significance of the construction of the Baykal-Amur Railway. It is all a youth project; young people began building work on the railway during its early days and young people are still building it today and, as matter of fact, they also run it. The point is, however, not that young people are involved in material production — young people take part in all spheres of our life. Of overriding importance is the fact that our society creates the necessary conditions to enable every young person to get an education, to develop all his capabilities, to become, as they say, a full-fledged and active member of our society, and to join in energetic working and social activity.

[Central television "World and Youth" reporter Vladimir (Makusyev) — speaking from the hall] You have given specific examples showing the great moral, physical, spiritual, and creative potential which our young people have. How will our party and government be bringing out this potential and realizing it in the cause of accelerating scientific and technical congress, both in the immediate future and the longer term?

[Aliyev] How will we be bringing out this potential? In the Political Report and other documents, including the Basic Guidelines for our country's economic and social development, a program for the acceleration of social and economic development is envisaged. Of course, in the implementation of this program we set a very great store in young people, in the Komsomol, in all of the energies of our youth. If, for instance, we are setting ourselves the task of accelerating social and economic development through the development of scientific and technical progress and the development of progressive industries, half of the people working in material production in our country are young people, half the intelligentsia are young people, so the implementation of our plans will depend on their skills, their abilities, their creativity, and their forward-looking stance. You know, generally speaking, we have outlined a program which is to run until the year 2000. Consequently, all this must be shouldered by young people — the young people of today and the young people who will have grown up by the year 2000. [end recording]

Gorbachev's Report on Literary Criticism Viewed

0900 GMT 27 Feb 86

[Interview with Soviet literary critic Feliks Kuznetsov, first secretary of the board of the Moscow writers organization and delegate to the 27th CPSU Congress, by unidentified correspondent in Moscow]

[Text] [Kuznetsov] References to literature, art, and literary study and criticism were traceable throughout Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev's report. That report made a fundamentally important point when it stated that it is impossible to get the economy, science, culture, and literature moving intensively without a spirit of competition. This is an extraordinarily important statement, this party directive, which is reflected in the assessment made in the new draft of the party program of the state of affairs and tasks in literary criticism.

Let me say that for me, personally, this was a great pleasure, because, for a long time we have been waging a struggle to restore to literary criticism the esteem it has unfortunately lost in recent decades. The fact is literary criticism had, in reality, been turned into a service for literature. The paying of undue compliments, sycophancy, criticism based on cash, criticism as a service to specific writers, showy criticism, criticism that strays far from concern for the true values of literature and life — regrettably, we have seen a great deal of that kind of criticism in recent years. A blight that is common today in many spheres of our economy is that of inflated reports. And when literary criticism goes in for panegyric eulogizing of works that are objectively weak and tries to prove a real aesthetic worth that they lack, then it is effectively engaging in inflated literary and aesthetic reporting. Unfortunately, very significant damage is inflicted here by what is called the merry-go-round. In self-criticism I ought to say that I, as a critic, and particularly as a writer of reports and reviews, have also on no few occasions been guilty of this sin of the merry-go-round, of endless listing...

[Correspondent, interrupting] Habitual listing of names.

[Kuznetsov] Habitual listing of names. But then there have been times when it was difficult, if not impossible, to list such names, at times the failure to mention them has been taken by certain writers as more or less an affront to their actions, as more or less some kind of criticism of them. We critics have at times lacked sufficient civic courage to take up an adequately precise, principled, and tested position. So, in this respect we have to bring about a transformation in our psychology. Indeed, there must be revolutionary arguments among ourselves. Let me say that only from arguing and discussing can the real truth emerge.

Returning to Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev's report: In the section where he was speaking of the social sciences, about their inadequate development and about them being distanced from the practice of our life, as the way of restoring social sciences to their full possibilities, he precisely underlined discussions and the setting of opinions and ideas one against another. And nothing awful would happen if the pages of our press were to give space to varying viewpoints about the works of our major, renowned, and best-known writers. Let, for instance, those people who like Chakovskiy's writing defend him; let those people who consider that Chakovskiy's writing, especially his latest novel, does not quite make the grade aesthetically, that it lacks richness of expression, that it is verbose, let those people prove their view. Time will judge which of us is right. There has been an extreme shortage of such debates. I hope that such literary debate, the struggle of opinions about specific works — naturally, from overall Soviet positions, from the positions of socialist realism — will gradually become the norm, as it should, in our literary relations.

Petroleum Industry February Performance Reported

[SOTSIALISTICHESKAYA INDUSTRIYA Heavy Industry Section report under the rubric "27th Congress: Power for Acceleration": "Oil Fields in February"]

[Text] Competition in honor of the 27th CPSU Congress, which reached its peak in the last month of winter, gave an effective boost to improvements in oil workers' work. As compared with January, the Ministry of the Petroleum Industry's enterprises increased average daily extraction of liquid fuel by almost 10,000 metric tons. Some 28 associations in the sector, which have produced an extra 330,000 metric tons of oil since the beginning of the year, successfully met their precongress pledges.

We here publish a status report on the fulfillment of the February plan for oil and gas condensate extraction by the leading enterprises of the petroleum industry:

Main Administration for the Construction of Petroleum and Gas Industry Enterprises in Tyumen Oblast	— 96.2
"Nizhnevartovskneftegaz"	— 95.9
"Yuganskneftegaz"	— 100.5
"Surgutneftegaz"	— 100.3
"Noyabrskneftegas"	— 82.1
"Krasnoleninskneftegaz"	— 101.1
"Vareganneftegaz"	— 88.4
"Tatneft"	— 99.0
"Bashneft"	— 100.4
"Komineft"	— 103.3
"Mangyshlakneft"	— 100.6
"Kuybyshevneft"	— 100.3
"Tomskneft"	— 97.7
"Permneft"	— 100.4
"Udmurtneft"	— 100.8
"Orenburgneft"	— 101.1
"Grozneft"	— 101.2
"Turkmenneft"	— 103.9
"Ukrneft"	— 100.8

The largest quantity of oil in excess of the plan — 45,500 metric tons — was produced by the Komi ASSR's oilfield workers. The high indicators achieved by that collective working in the harsh conditions of the north are not fortuitous. It made a fine start from the very first days of the new year and has been consistently developing its success. It is instructive that the "Komineft" fields also achieved the highest increase in the drilling of operational wells.

The oil workers of Orenburg Oblast succeeded in making up their January shortfall. They not only cleared the backlog but produced an extra 5,500 metric tons of hydrocarbon raw material. The collectives of many other traditional oil regions also worked well in February. "Turkmenneft," "Permneft," "Udmurtneft", "Kuybyshevneft," and "Ukrneft" associations managed to virtually stabilize the recovery level in old, very depleted areas.

However, the fate of the Ministry of the Petroleum Industry's annual plan is not primarily determined by those regions where, because of natural factors, the extraction potential of underground deposits is limited. The main burden falls on West Siberia. This year Tyumen Oblast must provide around 65 percent of all-union oil and gas condensate.

The state of affairs in the country's main fuel base still remains difficult. The Main Administration for the Construction of Petroleum and Gas Industry Enterprises in Tyumen Oblast had a shortfall of 270,000 metric tons of oil in February. Taken together with the January shortfall, the backlog now totals 2.24 million metric tons.

Nevertheless, the Siberian oil workers' results in the first 2 months give grounds for saying that the measures recently adopted by the Ministry of the Petroleum Industry and subcontracting ministries are beginning to yield a favorable result. Tyumen Oblast increased its daily extraction by almost 9,000 metric tons of oil in february and by around 22,000 metric tons since December.

Collectives of the "Surgutneft" association achieved weighty successes. In February more than 100 new wells with a total yield of approximately 3,000 metric tons per day were added to the oilfield networks. A substantial increase was obtained from the switch to mechanized extraction methods. Dozens of idle shafts were brought into operation and the number of them in Surgut is now below the set normative. The service interval for wells fitted with electric loading facilities has been extended to 400 hours. In terms of this important quality indicator, Surgut oil workers have almost reached the level of the pacesetting "Yuganskneftgaz" association in the north of Tyumen Oblast.

The young "Krasnoleninskneftegaz" association, whose oil extraction is more than one-third greater than in the corresponding period last year, is a competition leader. The harmonious collective of "Bashneft's" Tyumen subsidiary, which recorded a further 14,000 metric tons of liquid fuel above plan, again distinguished itself.

Against this backdrop of successes the serious shortcomings stand out even more sharply. Three of the Tyumen main administration's six associations failed to meet the February plan. These included the Ministry of Petroleum Industry's largest extracting eneterprise, "Nizhnevartovskneftegaz," which accounts for half of Tyumen's shortfall. "Noyabrskneftegaz" and "Vareganneftegaz" associations had a shortfall amounting to hundreds of thousands of metric tons.

February showed that the present rate of oil extraction is insufficient to meet the targets for the first year of the 5-year plan. Large reserves have yet to be brought into operation in the sector, advanced experience is being poorly disseminated, and the achievements of scientific and technical progress are being introduced too slowly. The country expects a resolute speeding up on the part of oil workers.

PRAVDA on CPSU Economic Strategy, Workers' Tasks

[Editorial: "The Party's Economic Strategy"]

[Text] The economy has been and still is the chief sphere of the party's and the entire Soviet people's activity. It is right here that the preconditions are created for ensuring a materially and spiritually rich and socially full life for Soviet people and achieving a new qualitative state for society.

Entirely approving the concept elaborated by the CPSU Central Committee of accelerating the country's socioeconomic development and the practical steps for implementing it, the 27th CPSU Congress noted in its resolution: The party's strategic course consists of making the transition to an economy of higher organization and efficiency with comprehensively developed production forces, mature socialist production relations, and a finely tuned economic mechanism.

The radical acceleration of scientific and technical progress is the fundamental question of the party's economic strategy. Over three 5-year plans we are faced with carrying out a new technical modernization of the national economy and, on this basis, transforming the material and technical base of society. It is planned to double the country's production potential by the year 2000 through its findamental qualitiative renewal. On the basis of improving equipment and technology, as well as mobilizing all organizational, economic, and social growth factors, it is planned to amost double the national income and to increase labor productivity 130-150 percent.

Scientific and technical progress confronts man with new tasks. He must not only know how to create the latest equipment but also use it efficiently in practice, which requires constant improvement of the entire system for training and continously raising people's qualifications and skill and the systematic striking of a balance between work places and manpower resources in all sectors and regions of the country.

The transition to the path of intensification requires major structural changes to the economy. Our national economy must be restructured flexibly and promptly in line with progressive advances in science, equipment, and technology and social and individual requirements. Sectors ensuring scientific and technical progress and the successful solution of social tasks will develop at a faster pace. In this connection, new demands are being made on investment policy. It must ensure rapid growth in the efficiency of capital investments, their concentration in decisive sectors, and the greatest increase in output and national income for every ruble spent. To this end the focus is shifting from new construction to the retooling and modernization of existing enterprises.

Turning the Soviet economy into the most perfect and strongest economy in the world requires further development of the basis of economic might — heavy industry. Here the party allocates the key role to machine building, which is required to produce systems and complexes of machinery, equipment, and instruments to the highest technical and economic standards. The real catalysts in accelerating the scientific and technical process — machine tool building, the electrical equipment industry, microelectronics, computer technology, instrument making, and the information science industry — will enjoy priority development. To achieve success in the development of these sectors, qualitative changes are needed in metallurgy, the chemical industry, and other sectors producing construction materials.

Widening the economy's scale demands efficient development of the country's fuel and energy complex and improvement of its structure. Nuclear power generation will develop at an accelerated pace, and it is planned to make increasingly wide use of renewable energy sources. At the same time, in the long term the 75-80 percent increase in requirements for fuel, energy, and other resources is to be satisfied by saving them in every possible way.

The 27th party congress resolution points out that it is the paramount task of party, soviet, and economic organs, of every Communist, and of all the people to persistently implement the party's modern agrarian policy and fulfill the USSR Food Program.

Social tasks will be solved successfully on the basis of developing social production. It has been and still is the highest aim of the party's economic strategy, the Basic Guidelines point out, to steadily raise the people's material and cultural living standards.

In the course of fulfilling the 27th CPSU Congress decisions, it is necessary to ensure the harmonious economic and social development of all the union republics — for which it is necessary to improve the distribution of production forces, strengthen the comprehensive nature of development, ensure that the economies of the republics and economic regions specialize, and increase their contribution to strengthening the country's unified national economic complex and solving social tasks.

The depth and scale of the transformations outlined by the congress require the leadership of the national economy to be raised to a new, higher level and, thus, better use to be made of the advantages and potential of the socialist planning system. The efforts of central organs must be concentrated on solving the statewide, intersector, and interregional problems of social production. At the same time, the task has been set of enhancing the role of economic management methods and the economic independence and responsibility of associations and enterprises. And for this it is necessary to go over systematically to new management methods.

"It will take time and energy to reorganize the economic machinery under the conditions of our country, with its vast and complex economy," M.S. Gorbachev pointed out in the CPSU Central Committee Political Report to the 27th party congress. "There could be difficulties, and we are not guaranteed against blunders; but still, the chief thing now is to move purposefully, step by step in the chosen direction, supplementing and improving the economic machinery on the basis of the experience accumulated and removing everything that is outmoded or has not justified itself."

The congress decisions state that the organizational structure of management needs to be improved at all levels and in all echelons of the national economy. This means amplifying or drawing up new general schemes of sector management, providing for a transmission primarily to a two-tier system, and creating organs age groups of interconnected sectors. The functions and rights of ministries and departments are to be amplified. They must focus efforts on determining their development prospects, shaping the most important proportions, and elaborating and implementing a unified scientific-technical and investment policy. In improving the management structure, it is important to seek the optimum ratios of worker in different spheres, substantially simplify and reduce the cost of the management apparatus, resolutely eliminate formalism and red tape in work, and sharply reduce the number of instructions and directions.

Soviet people wholeheartedly approve the 27th CPSU Congress decisions and express a fervent desire to work with inspiration, displaying a high degree of organization, initiative, and skill. Their labor efforts are directed toward the prompt, practical realization of the party's plans aimed at further strengthening the country's economic might and enhancing the people's well-being in every possible way.

The chief thing now is to achieve a quick breakthrough in work in accordance with the 27th CPSU Congress decisions, reach a turning point in all spheres of economic activity, and make more efficient use of the potential created. The essence of today's demands on labor collectives, party, soviet, and economic organs, and public organizations at the center and locally is to ensure that high results are achieved and to manage skillfully on the basis of organically combining the experience accumulated with new knowledge and new solutions. For this, the echelons where the greatest result can be achieved with minimum additional expenditure must be determined in every sector, association, and enterprise and in all shops and teams. And everything that has been outlined must be implemented in practice without delay.

Communists and party organizations bear great responsibility for implementing the plans adopted by the congress. It is they who must head the masses' political and labor upsurge and support and disseminate in every possible way the valuable initiative born during labor competition. Full use must be made of the chief and essentially inexhaustible reserve, which is the human factor, people, and their ability and desire to work skillfully and creatively and to ensure high organization, discipline, and order in every labor collective.

The 27th party congress materials and decisions are a specific action program for working people and all Soviet people. And the more organized, concerted, and harmonious our everyday creative work, the more successfully we will implement in practice the great program for transforming society outlined by the 27th CPSU Congress.

Azerbaijan Nuclear Power Plant — The Azerbaijan nuclear power plant will be one of the most important objects in the republic in the 12th 5-Year Plan period. Preparation work is continuing on the construction site. The construction administration recently set up has carried out work worth R7 million in a short time. A 9-story building has been put into operation for construction workers and 20 2-story buildings are being built as part of the new town in that region. The plans of the nuclear power plant will be submitted to the USSR State Planning Committee and the USSR State Committee for Construction Affairs in the near future for the final time. Azerbaijan Oil Well — The well drilled by the fourth platform in the 28 April oil field on the Caspian Sea has reconfirmed that this oil field is the richest in our republic. The well began production for the first time yesterday. Its daily capacity is 300 tons. [Summary] [Baku Domestic Service in Azeri 0205 GTM 17 Feb 86 GF]

GES Corrosion Inhibitor — Some 15 million tons of iron, steel, and rolled material corrode in the USSR each year. Corrosion also affects expensive machinery. Thus the Leningrad Elektrosila association and the Sayan-Shushenskoye GES joined efforts to beat the corrosion. A Leningrad professor (?Sukhotin), says:

GES generators use water for cooling, but water causes corrosion; thus a special "inhibitor" is added to the water which protects against corrosion, in fact it slows corrosion down 1,000 or more times. The research work of this chemical method started 4 years ago. It was tested in a laboratory, then on one of the GES generators, and now five of the Sayan-Shyshenskoye GESes are protected by the corrosion inhibitors. Perm Turbine Assembly — Comprehensive testing of of the turbine assembly (capacity 80,000 kilowatts) is now complete and assembly of the final sections of a suspended boiler at the Perm GRES is under way. Nevertheless, work is behind schedule and the GRES should really be generating power by now. The delay has been put down to lack of liaison between various groups involved in the construction of the power station. Comrade (Kotov), secretary of the Perm Obkom, has singled out in particular the lack of consistency in delivery times for metal construction assemblies. Work is now well under way to reduce the delays in the final generating sets coming on line. [Summary] [Moscow Domestic Service in Russian 0700 GMT 14 Jan 86 LD]

Reportage on 16 Mar 'Mir,' 'Soyuz T-15' Docking

'Insignificant Malfunctions' in 'Mir'

LD142105 Moscow in English to Great Britain and Ireland 2000 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Excerpts] The crew of the Soviet spacecraft Soyuz T-15, Leonid Kizim and Vladimir Solovyev, are in orbit to start the 15-hour Soviet space mission. Their take-off was broadcast live by Soviet television and the Intervision TV network to millions of Soviet and foreign viewers. The cosmonauts are to dock their spacecraft with the new Soviet lab Mir, which is circling the earth in an unmanned mode after its launch last month.

A deputy director of the mission, Viktor Blagov, reports that the station has so far revolved around the earth about 350 times. A check on the station system has revealed insignificant malfunctions but these have been dealt with and the station is ready to receivve the crew. All scientific and production facilities are to be brought to the station in special modules, unmanned spacecraft as large as the station itself. These will be packed on earth with various equipment to function in orbit as workshops or research labs.

The Mir station will be used to carry out a program of research in the interests of science and the economy. Meanwhile its veteran predecessor, the Salyut, continues orbiting the earth ready to receive cosmonauts. Crews will able to fly from one station to another.

Maneuver for Docking

LD142133 [Editorial Report] Moscow Domestic Service in Russian at 1600 GMT on 14 March broadcasts a report by Leonid Lazarevich on the activities of cosmonauts Kizim and Solovyev, who are working on board the Soyuz T-15 spacecraft.

Lazarevich describes the impatience of the cosmonauts to dock with Mir and to start power work on the orbit. The approach to the orbital station is being performed now, according to a new flight timetable, because getting to the station takes 2 days instead of the usual 1 day. "This has a number of advantages," Lazarevich says. "Fuel is consumed in a more economical way, and both the crew and specialists of the Flight Control Center can work in a more relaxed way. But the main work is delayed, after all. True, there is enough work right now. Its purpose is to catch up with the station, which is still flying higher than the spacecraft." A brief fragment from a communication session with the cosmonauts is introduced, during which they say that they have completed "the maneuver" and are aligned with the sun. Lazarevich wishes the cosmonauts success.

Docking Completed

[Text] Moscow, March 15 TASS — The spaceship Soyuz T-15 piloted by Leonid Kizim and Vladimir Solovyev docked with the orbital research station Mir (peace) at 16 hours 38 minutes Moscow time today.

Both cosmonauts are in good health and feel well.

Cosmonauts Enter 'Mir'

LD151626 Moscow TASS in English 1618 GMT 15 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow, March 15 TASS — The spaceship Soyuz T-15 docked with the orbital research station Mir (peace) at 16 hours 38 minutes Moscow time today. Following a check of the docking unit's pressure-tightness Leonid Kizim and Vladimir Solovyev went into the station.

The crew's mission provides for the reactivation of the Mir station, the testing of its structural components and onboard systems, the tuning and adjustment of units and equipment. The purpose of these operations is to prepare the station as a base unit for building in the future a permanently operating manned complex with specialized modules designed to tackle scientific and national economic tasks.

According to telemetry data, the systems of the Mir station and the Soyuz T-15 spacecraft are functioning normally.

At the present time two orbital complexes sare in flight in near-earth space. These are the manned complex Mir—Soyuz T-15 and the Salyut-7—Cosmos—1686 complex that is flying in an automatic regime.

The cosmonauts are in good health and feeling well.

TV Report on Docking

LD151508 Moscow Television Service in Russian 1350 GMT 15 Mar 86

[Special correspondent Aleksandr Galkin report from Flight Control Center]

[Text] [Galkin] Attention. Flight Control Center on the air. Soyuz T-15 has just docked with the Mir station, a few minutes earlier than planned.

Cosmonauts Leonid Kizim and Vladimir Solovyev began the approach manually from a distance of 200 meters and approached so close and moved towards the docking so surely that not even a television picture was required. We did not manage to see anything here; we just listened.

This will be commented on by a member of the Mayak [space crew's call-sign] back-up team, Aleksandr Pavlovich Aleksandrov.

[Aleksandrov] We have just witnessed a quite unique event, the docking with such a powerful and we think beautiful and large, peaceful station, Mir. The Mayaks fulfilled their task wonderfully, and no doubt you heard Aleksandr Galkin saying that this was accomplished a little earlier than planned. This really did take place early, and I shall explain why.

The Mir station responded to radio signals from our vessel, the Soyuz T-15, at a distance of 200 meters. Then the crew were to take over manual control, make a flight around the station and dock from the side of the transfer compartment. The crew kept so well to the timetable, the automation worked so well, that it became possible to do this rather earlier. And then Leonid Kizim steered the vessel so precisely and Volodya Solovyev worked precisely as flight engineer and navigator and the crew fulfilled the task of fly-around and docking, again in a reduced time, as it were speeding up the whole process, and skillfully, most precisely and accurately brought the station — I should say the vessel, he brought his vessel, the Soyuz T-15 — to the station. And here no one sensed any sudden shift in the situation. It went off very quietly. But it was a very bright and powerful event; the docking with Mir could generally be called a landmark for us.

[Galkin] What are your colleagues doing now, at this moment.

[Aleksandrov] At the moment the systems are being checked. First of all there is the locking of these two massive bodies — the station and the vessel, and they are now checking the systems and preparing to go over into the Mir station.

Radio Reports Docking

LD152038 [Editorial Report] Moscow Domestic Service in Russian at 1339 GMT interrupts its scheduled music program for a 10-minute report introduced by correspondent Nikolay Neych. Neych begins by saying: "At this moment, two spacecraft are in orbit above our planet. The Mir station and Soyuz T-15 are approaching each nother, maneuvering and, I think, have already docked together." He then hands over to correspondent Petr Pelekhov in the Flight Control Center, who continues: "There is no uncertainty over whether they have docked: We have actually just heard the words: We have contact, we have docked, we have lock-on. It's in a zone of not very steady reception, so the words were not readily audible. In a few minutes time the reception will be more steady and we will hear the details of the docking. But meanwhile, I should say that we have been given the schedule for the docking, and the docking took place earlier than scheduled. The reason for this is that ground control now has much more faith in the crew, taking into account both the experience accumulated on earth during training and also the experience accumulated in previous flights."

Pelekhov then interviews Viktor Petrovich Savinykh, the flight engineer on Soyuz T-14, who says: "The crew made a very calm approach to the Mir orbital station. and now they have already docked. The crew was given permission to select the time of docking themselves." Pelekhov notes that the flight was in automatic mode up to a distance of 200 meters from the station, and asks Savinykh to describe what happened then. Savinykh replies: "Yes, the two craft were in automatic approach mode from a distance of approximately 18 km; at a distance of 200 meters, the crew switched off the automatics, the station turned so that the required docking unit faced the orbiter, and then the crew came in manually and docked very skilfully with the Mir orbital station."

Pelekhov asks: "Incidentally, this craft is the last in the series that was designed for operation with stations of previous generations, the Salyut stations. I think that the next craft will be provided with a special radio system adapted for docking with this station, won't it?" Savinykh replies: "It probably will, and with other things besides. After all, all of our technology is being developed. First we had Soyuz, then there was Soyuz-5, and then for my flight with Dzhanibekov we had a [word indistinct] laser range finder. On future spacecraft all this will, of course, be improved and naturally new systems for docking will appear."

Pelekhov continues: "Another thing. At a distance of 200 meters the station wasn't oriented, so was it difficult to steer the craft?" Savinykh replies: "No, at that point the station was oriented. It was in an oriented position, but when they flew around the station it was unoriented. This was practiced on earth, and this mode of operation was in fact preplanned." Savinykh then says that that the crew will now check that the two craft are locked on together, the lock-together force being 20 metric tons; they will then check the air-tightness of the docking seal and then enter the station.

Cosmonaut Dzhanibekov Evaluates 'Mir' Docking

LD151834 Moscow Domestic Service in Russian
1600 GMT 15 Mar 86

[Interview from Flight Control Center with Pilot-Cosmonaut of the USSR, Twice Hero of the Soviet Union Vladimir Aleksandrovich Dzhanibekov, by unidentified correspondent; recorded, first paragraph is studio introduction]

[Text] At this moment the cosmonauts are taking their first steps in their new home in space. Here is an interview which has just been sent in by our correspondents from the Flight Control Center.

[Correspondent] Vladimir Aleksandrovich, you have had occasion to carry out direct manual docking, and we would like to hear from you some evaluation of the work the men have done.

[Dzhanibekov] The assessment given by the whole control center and by everyone who has witnessed today's approach and docking mode is that it was excellent. The mode proceeded impeccably; and I would like to note particularly the work of Leonid Kizim who coped outstandingly with the final stage. The new space complex Mir-Soyuz T-15 is now functioning in orbit. I would like to note that the Mir is a totally new-generation station. We hope that it will enable us to solve over the next 5 years — and perhaps even longer than that — tasks that are much wider and more serious than those we have done on previous stations, including the Salyut-7. And I would like to believe that man, proving the very great possibilities that he has in space, will be able to continue on this occasion, too, the affirmation of man in space, in work in outer space, in work in the interests of the future of our earth.

[Correspondent] Nevertheless I would like to recall Salyut-7, which is also in orbit now.

[Dzhanibekov] We hope that it will serve us for some time, and we are not yet writing off the Salyut-7 station. It is still quite capable of working, and evidently in the very near future we will do some work there, too.

[Correspondent] So the result will be a kind of commuting between the two stations — almost like one does between one's aparment in the city and one's dacha — from Mir to Salyut and from Salyut to Mir?

[Dzhanibekov] Indeed, it is expected that when some initial work, as I would call it, has been completed on the Mir station, that the Mayaks [codename for cosmonauts] crew will fly across to the Salyut-7 station. I have confidence in both Vladimir Solovyev and Leonid Kizim that they will do everything as it should be done.

Flight Parameters Updated

LD161129 Moscow TASS in English 1121 GMT 16 Mar 86

[Text] March, 16 TASS — The manned research complex Mir—Soyuz T-15 is operating in near-earth orbit for the second day.

In accordance with schedule, the cosmonauts Leonid Kizim and Vladimir Solovyev are fulfilling necessary operations in order to transfer the station into a manned mode of operation. They are reactivating life-support and temperature-control systems, checking the functioning of radiotechnical means, the state of equipment, etc.

Conditions close to those on earth are maintained in the living quarters of the Mir station: The temperature is 24 degrees centigrade, the pressure is 860 millimetres of the mercury column.

According to telemetry and reports by the crew, the flight of the manned complex Mir—Soyuz T-15 is proceeding normally. Its orbit parameters are as follows:

Maximum distance from the earth's surface — 354 kilometres,

Minimum distance from the earth's surface — 332 km,

Period of revolution — 91.2 minutes,

Inclination — 51.6 degrees.

The cosmonauts Kizim and Solovyev are in good health, and are feeling fine.

Cosmonaut Describes 'Mir' Layout, Structure

LD152154 Moscow TASS in English 1842 GMT 15 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow, March 15 TASS — The establishment of a new Soviet permanent space complex in space on the basis of the Mir long-term orbital station is offering broad opportunities for Soviet manned space missions, Cosmonaut Valeriy Kubasov told TASS.

On the eve of the 25th anniversary of the flight of the world's first Cosmonaut Yuriy Gagarin, due on April 12, I recall anew his forecast: "We will take our places in new ships and reach new orbits." Nowadays my fellow cosmonauts, Soyuz T-15 crew Commander Leonid Kizim and Flight Engineer Vladimir Solovyev, are plying those orbits. Their mission is a good way to mark the forthcoming jubilee, Kubasov said.

This docking, the cosmonaut continued, was not conventional. Whereas in the past that operation had been performed 24 hours after the launch, now it took place later. Kubasov explained that the two-day interval between the launch and the docking had been decided upon better to test the systems of the spaceship that were involved in the docking. Less fuel, too, is spent in this way.

As for the main new features of the station, Kubasov pointed out its six docking units. The aft and tail ones are intended for manned and frieght ships. If need be, a special manipulator can transfer the aft module to one of the side docking units.

As for craft to be docked, according to the cosmonaut, they may be scientific modules intended for astrophysical or technological experiments.

Broad opportunities are thus being opened for the development of scientific laboratories to carry out research for the national economy.

The Mir station is a base for the development of long-term orbital complexes with rotating crews.

Leonid Kizim and Vladimir Solovyev must have already appreciated the innovations inside the station. First, Valeriy Kubasov continued, crew members now have separate compartments complete with a table, a chair and an intercom. Members of mixed crews who perhaps will work abroad the new complex will especially admire this arrangement.

The new station is roomier because the compartment with scientific instruments has been removed. Now large-size equipment will be housed in modules. The orbital "mess-room" is more convenient and cosy. The life support system has been modified. in particular, the on-board air regeneration system has been improved.

The latest achievements of Soviet science and technology and original design solutions have been incorporated in the station.

The new station is called Mir, peace, a great word understandable to everyone in the world. This stresses anew that the Soviet Union is intent on the peaceful exploration of space and it is for this purpose that Soviet spaceships and stations go out into the great unknown.

ACDA CLAIMS OF SOVIET ARMS VIOLATIONS ASSAILED

[Yu. Viktorov article: "At Variance With the Geneva Accords"]

[Text] In the United States -- for the umpteenth time -- a propaganda clamor has been unleashed to "indict" the Soviet Union for alleged "violations" of treaty commitments. This time the initiator of this campaign is the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, which has disseminated a report on instances of alleged noncompliance by the Soviet Union with arms limitation agreements. The agency's new propaganda opus, as the agency itself acknowledges, raises no "new" questions on this well-worn theme. It merely repeats the content of three well-known presidential reports to the U.S. Congress on this topic published in 1984 and 1985.

All these "indictments" were repeatedly and convincingly rebutted by the Soviet Union. Taking this into account, it might have been possible to disregard the U.S. Administration's hackneyed theses. But their danger lies in the fact that they are being used to deceive the public, extract money from the Congress to crank up the arms race, and justify the administration's intention to disregard existing agreements. For the question that is being posed at precisely this time is: Will the U.S. Congress agree to fund multibillion-dollar Pentagon programs, including the "star wars" program? It is also well known that in less than 2 months the U.S. President will have to make a decision on whether to continue to observe the limitations stipulated in the SALT II Treaty on the number of MIRVed strategic ballistic missiles. The objective in publishing the report becomes obvious from this. It is to prepare the American and foreign public for the U.S. "countermeasures" that the administration is currently formulating, about which agency director Adelman has spoken frankly at various briefings.

What are they attempting to accuse the Soviet Union of? Even the report itself describes most of the so-called "violations" as "probable," "possible in the future," or "unclear" because of "a shortage of facts." This in itself testifies to the unscrupulousness of the authors, who have not balked at offering the public such unsubstantiated material. As for some other "facts" served up in the report under the rubric "violations," there is not a grain of truth in them.

Here is a sample of this unsavory output. There is continuing speculation in the United States on the Soviet radar station under construction in the Krasnoyarsh region. Various functions are ascribed to it -- it is either an early warning station or an ABM station. However neither version corresponds to reality. This radar station is designed for tracking space objects and monitoring outer space and therefore has nothing to do with the ABM treaty.

Also groundless is the story being spread by Washington that, in addition to the one new type of ICBM authorized by the SALT II Treaty, a second new type is being created [sozdayetsya] in the USSR. In practice this is how they are attempting to depict the modernized missile known as the RS-12M, whose characteristics are completely in accordance with the provisions of the SALT II Treaty.

The U.S. complaints that the USSR encrypts telemetric information received from the missile during tests, which is supposedly necessary for verification [kontrol] under the SALT II Treaty, cannot stand up to close examination. The USSR does not encrypt such information. With a view to resolving this question, we asked the United States to specify the parameters which, in its opinion, ought not to be encrypted. The U.S. side refused to do this, which confirms yet again how farfetched its complaints are.

Another totally farfetched claim is the one that the Soviet Union has supposedly exceeded the quantitative level of strategic delivery vehicles existing at the time the SALT II Treaty was signed. It was declared at the signing of the treaty that the USSR had 2,504 strategic delivery vehicles. This quantity has not increased by a single unit. The sublevels set for MIRVed missiles and for heavy bombers carrying long-range "air-to-surface" cruise missiles are also being rigorously observed.

Displaying a constructive approach toward relations with the United States, the Soviet Union has already supplied exhaustive clarifications on these and on all other issues raised by the U.S. side. These clarifications were supplied both at the specially established Soviet-U.S. Permanent Consultative Commission, and through diplomatic channels. The invalidity of the U.S. side's claims was fully proved. It is, however, evident that certain forces in the United States are unwilling to come to terms with this. By spreading deliberate slander, they are striving to play down everything new and positive that emerged in Soviet-U.S. relations as a result of the Geneva summit meeting and, as in the past, are seeking ways to attain military superiority over the USSR by cranking up the arms race, which is contrary to existing agreements in the arms limitation sphere.

The United States -- particularly under the incumbent administration -- is trying to place itself above international law and custom and to implement a policy whose correctness and fairness are measured only in terms of U.S. judgments and, ultimately, in terms of strength. In light of all this, it is not the United States but the USSR that is fully justified in feeling anxious about the other side's failure to fulfill the commitments it has adopted.

Take for instance the starting of work on the "star wars" program, which is aimed ultimately at the creation [sozdaniye] of a U.S. territorial ABM system. This is indeed totally contrary to the 1972 ABM Treary, which is of unlimited duration. Actions by the United States such as the deployment of large radar stations with parameters close to those of ABM radar stations on its own territory and beyond its borders also do not accord with this treaty's provisions. The treaty is seriously threatened by work in the sphere of mobile ABM radar stations, MIRV's for antimissile missiles, tests of antimissile missiles created [sozdannyy] on the basis of ICBM's, and so on.

Take another example. After signing in 1979 the SALT II Treaty, which establishes a balance between USSR and U.S. strategic forces, the U.S. side refused to ratify it. While demagogically stating its intention to comply with the provisions of the treaty, the U.S. Administration in practice steered a course toward changing in its own favor the prevailing approximate balance of strategic forces. The deployment of U.S. medium-range missiles in certain West European countries is aimed at this. This is also shown by the U.S. activity in implementing its numerous strategic programs. Some of these are now beginning not to fit within the bounds of the existing accords. This U.S. line is having an adverse influence on the course of the Geneva talks on nuclear and space arms, which is by no means conducive to implementing the accord on accelerating those talks which was reached at summit level.

Other facts testifying to the U.S. side's disdainful attitude toward observing its own juridical and political commitments could also be cited. However, what has already been said shows that the thrust of the U.S. Administration's actions is to conceal its own efforts to undermine and erode the existing system of agreements in the sphere of arms limitation and reduction beneath a screen of statements and reports regarding imagined "Soviet" violations of treaty provisions. The method is not new.

"All parties must fully comply with the agreements they conclude" -- this thesis contained in the U.S. agency's report should be addressed primarily to the current U.S. Administration. It is hard to imagine that the U.S. side does not realize what consequences arise from its steps contravening the existing accords. This line tends to disorganize normal relations between states. It in no way accords with the U.S. leaders' statements regarding their desire to organize constructive relations with the Soviet Union.

Nor is it an accident that the campaign to accuse the USSR of "violating" its commitments is being resumed now, when the United States has failed to come up with a constructive answer to the large-scale Soviet initiatives in the sphere of disarmament and security. The forces that are making colossal profits out of the production of more and more new types of weapons are trying to question the feasibility of the USSR's proposals and its readiness to fulfill existing and future accords.

The 27th CPSU Congress stated that the desire for military superiority objectively cannot yield any political gain for anyone. The Soviet Union proceeds precisely on the basis of this truth. Therefore it cannot have any incentives to abandon or violate accords formulated on the basis of euality and identical security.

In accordance with its Constitution, the Soviet Union bases its relations with other countries on conscientious fulfillment of the commitments arising from the generally recognized principles and norms of international law and from the international treat treaties conclude by the USSR. This principle is one of the fundamental principles in the foreign policy pursued by the Soviet Union. And it is strictly observed.

Taking into account the great importance for the cause of peace of Soviet-U.S. agreements in the sphere of limiting and reducing strategic arms and other treaty documents aimed at strengthening the peoples' security, we are entitled to expect the U.S. side not merely in words but in deeds to conscientiously fulfill the commitments it has assumed.

PRAVDA RAPS ADELMAN REMARKS IN ACADA BROCHURE

PM111330 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 8 Mar 86 Second Edition p 5

[T. Anatolyev "Rejoinder": "Why the Repetition?"]

[Text] The Arms Control and Disarmament Agency has published with enviable haste a brochure containing the Washington administration's jarring fabrications about so-called "Soviet violations of arms control agreements."

Why, one asks? Why repeat a lie when everyone knows that even if a lie is repeated many times that still does not make it true. But the authors of the libelous brochure do not count on that. They have another, extremely specific goal: to cast aspersions on the broad range of major new Soviet proposals aimed at eliminating nuclear weapons and ensuring reliable international security, and to call into question the very possibility of ending the arms race and ensuring disarmament.

K. Adelman, director of the agency, states outright in the foreword to this "publication" that certain "Soviet treaty violations...threaten the future viability of the arms control process." He went so far as to say that "this is actually a dangerous form of unilateral disarmament under the cover of bilateral arms control."

You see how simple everything is. For the United States any new agreements with the USSR in the arms limitation and reductions sphere would essentially mean "unilateral disarmament," so they are not worth talking about. We will say bluntly that Mr Adelman's thinking is simplistic if he supposes that this excuse for logic could justify to the public Washington's reluctance to provide a constructive response to the Soviet initiatives.

BOGACHEV COMMENTS ON NUCLEAR MORATORIUM ISSUE

LD142334 Moscow TASS International Service in Russian 2233 GMT 14 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow, 15 Mar (TASS) -- TASS military observer Vladimir Bogachev writes:

In the postwar years, the United States has carried out more nuclear weapons tests than all the other countries of the world put together. Nevertheless, President Reagan considers that the Soviet Union has acted "unjustly" in relation to the United States in calling upon it to join in the Soviet moratorium on all nuclear explosions declared almost 8 months ago. The United States cannot now speak of a ban on nuclear explosions, the President said in an interview to the American BALTIMORE SUN newspaper.

Having spent more than a trillion dollars in the last 5 years on preparations for war, Reagan alleges that the Soviet Union is still outstripping the United States in the military sphere, and that stopping American nuclear tests will -- according to him -- "leave the United States in a position where it is increasingly lagging behind." The President preferred not to specify how many more trillion dollars he intends to spend on nuclear armaments in order to get close to what he described as the "United States' long-term aim" -- the cessation of nuclear tests.

Washington's refusal to come to agreement on a total cessation of nuclear explosions illuminates before the whole world the present U.S. Administration's obstructionist position on the whole spectrum of problems of limitation and reduction of nuclear weapons, and shows the insincerity of statements by U.S. officials about their aspiration "to make nuclear weapons outmoded and powerless". Under these conditions, the U.S. Administration is compelled to dodge and maneuver.

Speaking about the "danger" of a moratorium, the President reaches the absurd conclusion that an accord on ending nuclear explosions will allegedly be possible only "at a time when the nuclear forces of restraint are no longer such an essential element of international security and stability as at present." Putting forward this abstruse thesis, the U.S. Administration is attempting to prove that the path to stability and mutual trust is through the unlimited build up and qualitative improvement of nuclear weapons.

The Soviet Union proposes banning tests of nuclear weapons, thereby taking an important step along the path to eliminating arsenals of mass attack. Washington is attempting to legalize nuclear weapons tests.

Instead of the measures for effectively verifying observation of a ban on nuclear explosions put forward by the Soviet Union, Washington is proposing the creation of an "inspection" for observing the continuation of these tests. Against all logic, the White House is even trying to portray this initiative as almost a good will gesture by the United States...

For the 8th month in succession, the USSR has not carried out any nuclear explosions, having given the U.S. Administration extra time to weigh the Soviet proposals. In making this goodwill gesture the Soviet Union has incurred some expenses, both in military and national economic respects. The unilateral Soviet moratorium on nuclear explosions cannot continue indefinitely.

The Soviet Union has announced that it will not carry out nuclear explosions after 31 March either, until the United States' first nuclear explosion.

The U.S. Administration will now have just as much time to evaluate the impact of a nuclear moratorium on the stability of the world situation as it wishes.

GROMYKO MEETS WESTERN ANTI-WAR ACTIVISTS

LD171804 Moscow TASS in English 1744 GMT 17 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow March 17 TASS -- Member of the Political Bureau of the CPSU Central Committee, President of the Presidium of the USSR Supreme Soviet Andrey Gromyko today received in the Kremlin a group of foreign participants in the third information meeting -- seminar of representatives of anti-war organizations of Western Europe, USA and Canada.

The group includes prominent peace champions representing a wide spectrum of anti-militaristic forces in their countries; retired Brigadier General Michael Harbottle of Great Britain, director of the Centre for International Peace, administrator of the international group "Generals for Peace and Disarmament"; Hermod Lannung of Denmark, chairman of the National Preparatory Committee of the World Congress devoted to the International Year of Peace, member of the Radical Party's leadership, president of the World Association of World Federalists; Claudio Gentili, chief of the department of the struggle for peace and disarmament of the Christian Association of Italian Working People; Robert Penner, coordinator of the Canadian Peace Alliance; Howard Frazier of the USA, executive director of Promoting Enduring Peace; Rudolf Merker of the FRG, chairman of the Bonn district organization of the SDP [Social Democratic Party]; Eva Norland of Sweden, leader of the Women for Peace movement; leaders of peace organizations from Belgium, Greece, Netherlands, Finland, France, Switzerland.

During the conversation which passed in a friendly atmosphere, Andrey Gromyko pointed out that the demands of peace champions in many countries are consonant with the recent Soviet peace initiatives.

The anti-war movements that have been launched in many states on all continents are highly assessed in the Soviet Union.

Andrey Gromyko dwelt particularly on the proposals set out in the Statement of General Secretary of the CPSU Central Committee Mikhail Gorbachev of January 15, as well as on the foundations of the all-embracing system of international security which was set out in detail in the Political Report of the CPSU Central Committee to the 27th congress of the Soviet Communists.

It was stressed that the program of consolidating peace which the Soviet Union is conducting consistently shows what must be done for the improvement of the international situation and solution of the cardinal problem of the present -- removal of the threat of war. The essence of this program is complete elimination of nuclear arms by the end of the current century and prevention of the militarization of outer space. The Soviet peace initiatives are equally addressed to governments and peoples of all countries, large and small, no matter where they are situated, in the West or in the East, in the north or in the south.

Advancing its proposals the Soviet Union proceeds from the view that in conditions of nuclear menace [an] objective situation has formed in which confrontation between capitalism and socialism can proceed exclusively in the forms of peaceful competition and peaceful rivalry.

The participants in the conversation from foreign countries stressed that the Soviet proposals evoke broad response the world over. These proposals are highly assessed by peoples.

Taking part in the conversation were Chairman of the Soviet of Nationalities of the USSR Supreme Soviet A.E. Voss, Secretary of the Presidium of the USSR Supreme Soviet T.N. Menteshashvili, Chairman of the Soviet Peace Committee G.A. Zhukov, deputy of the USSR Supreme Soviet.

WEEKLY 'INTERNATIONAL OBSERVERS ROUNDTABLE'

LD161849 Moscow Domestic Service in Russian 1230 GMT 16 Mar 86

["International Observers Roundtable" program, with political observers Aleksandr Yevgeniyevich Bovin and Nikolay Shishlin; and Viktor Nikolayevich Levin, All-Union Radio commentator]

[Text] [Levin] Hello, esteemed comrades. This week's events show that the ideas and solutions of the complex international problems facing mankind advanced by the 27th CPSU Congress are not just finding a wide response among the international public, but are being reflected in the stance taken by a whole range of states. I am thinking specifically of the letter from the so-called Delhi six -- that is, the leaders of the following six states: Argentina, India, Mexico, Tanzania, Sweden, and Greece -- which once again recently sent messages to the leaders of the Soviet Union and the United States containing their proposals and their ideas on improving the international situation. In particular, these leaders express the idea of setting up a system of international security.

It is precisely this aspect that is consonant with the proposal put forth by the Soviet Union -- the proposal was set out in the 27th CPSU Congress Central Committee Political Report -- on setting up an all-embracing system of international security. I am not going to repeat everything that is in this Soviet concept, but I want to draw your attention to the fact that in the military sphere the Soviet Union promotes the idea that the nuclear powers should renounce war, both nuclear and conventional, against each other and against third states. Very closely linked with this is the second proposal, that an arms race in space should not be permitted, that all nuclear weapons tests should be halted, and that these should be eliminated completely; that chemical weapons should be banned and destroyed, and that the development of other means of mass destruction should be renounced. The message from the Delhi six says that it would be very useful, on the threshold of a new Soviet-U.S. summit meeting, if the Soviet Union and the United States were not to carry out nuclear explosions, at least until this meeting.

The position of the Soviet Union is known. Effective last August we unilaterally introduced a moratorium on conducting nuclear explosions whether for military or peaceful purposes. Then, in the Statement on 15 January by Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev, we extended this moratorium until 31 March. In other words, we gave the Americans an opportunity to consider their position once again and to discuss carefully once again the situation that has come about. We made yet another good-will gesture.

[Shishlin] Viktor Nikolayevich, I think that we should add here the fact that the Soviet Union did not simply carry out this good-will act and unilaterally end all nuclear tests. In addition to this, the Soviet Union invited the United States and Great Britain to start talks immediately and without delay in order to conclude a treaty of full value on ending all nuclear tests, naturally with the appropriate monitoring, including on-site inspection, so that there was also a purely working proposal here in order to reach a real agreement. Well, we have said many times what an accord would lead to, because it would indeed signify a great deal in the purely military and technical area too; but the main thing is that it would be a breakthrough toward the creation of a new atmoshpere, not just in Soviet-U.S. relations but in international relations in general. But the new position which has been set out in the reply by Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev to the joint approach by the leaders of the six states amounts to this: The Soviet Union will refrain from carrying out nuclear tests until such time as the United States carries out a nuclear explosion. This is in fact a continuation of the line, the very firm line, aimed at trying to reach a real agreement in so far as the U.S. "no" to all these proposals moves and actions might have consequences on many different planes.

[Levin] I would also say that the reply by Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev -- and attention has to be given to this -- puts forth a proposal on working out the treaty you are talking about on banning nuclear tests completely, and there too we are raising the issue in a new way. We are proposing that we set out working on such a treaty without delay and that the appropriate talks be resumed or started in any form, be it bilateral, trilateral, or multilateral talks, and that this not be tied to any other issues. This, too, is a new point, and a very important point which testifies to the constructive nature of our position and a sincere desire to find some points of contact with the Americans.

[Shishlin] From the very beginning it was stated by the Soviet Union that we do not link the ending of nuclear tests with the rejection by the United States of the so-called Strategic Defense Initiative, just as we do not link with it the issue -- and the solution of the issue -- of eliminating medium-range nuclear arms in Europe.

[Levin] I am thinking of the fact that now we are also proposing bilateral talks, this is a new point.

[Bovin] Unfortunately, however, there is an old point that can be seen very clearly indeed here, the fact that the Americans are continuing to say the same "no" they have been saying all along, and this is characteristic of Reagan's policy and position. And overall it has to be said that the U.S. position is so vulnerable that from the viewpoint of world public opinion, even from the viewpoint of very many politicians in America itself, Reagan's position is absolutely unconstructive and contradicts common sense. For example, things have reached the point where the U.S. House of Representatives has adopted a special resolution which demands that the U.S. President, in the first place, ratify -- we do not have treaties with the United States; we have signed...

[Shishlin, interrupting] Two.

[Bovin] Two treaties, limiting underground nuclear weapons tests and dealing with nuclear explosions for peaceful purposes. We have signed them but the United States has not ratified them. And so the House of Representatives is demanding that the President, in the first place, ratify both these treaties immediately, and second, that he join in talks with the Soviet Union on the conclusion of a treaty on an all-embracing ban on nuclear explosions. The President sent a special letter to the House of Representatives and stated in this letter that this resolution of the House of Representatives runs counter to the interests of the national security of the United States.

The evolution of the U.S. position is very interesting. To begin with it was like this: The Russians do not want to monitor, and if there is not going to be any monitoring then there will be no agreement. Later it became clear that things were not like this at all. By all means, we say, there will be a monitoring system, let us agree and include on-site inspection, in other words, this trump card, this argument, is knocked out of their hand.

They then began talking like this: We need to carry out nuclear tests because we need to modernize our nuclear weapons; the Russians have overtaken us; they have done all they need to; we have fallen behind and we have to catch up. Then it became clear that this was not the truth either. And now, it would appear, there is no room for any further withdrawal, yet Reagan has constructed himself yet another redoubt. His logic is as follows: The nuclear weapons that we currently possess are the main means for deterring the Soviet Union. But in order for this means of deterrence to be good it needs to be tested from time to time, otherwise its reliability will be low.

There are, say, 10,000 warheads in store there: Who knows what happens to them over a 10 year period. In order to be sure, each batch must be tested regularly. And Reagan says to begin with we must reach agreement on reducing nuclear weapons, then afterwards talk about banning tests. That is to say, everything is now being turned the other way around.

Of course, it is sad that the Americans are behaving in this way because all people are now waiting for the second summit meeting. As we know, it would be very good and desirable if it were possible to resolve some specific issues at this meeting. Well, all right, the first time they met, they talked, they to to know each other. On the second occasion it would be desirable to solve some specific problems. There are two problems which are more or less capable of being viewed as candidates for solution: The problem of a nuclear test ban, and the Euroweapons problem. But, unfortunately, the position of the U.S. Administration here, for the present, does not leave any room for optimism, to say the least.

[Shishlin] Aleksandr Yevgeniyevich, you have touched upon a very serious question here, because whatever happens we are still obliged to view all actions of the United States, and also our own actions, through the prism of a possible Soviet-U.S. summit meeting. And if one looks closely at the list of serious actions that have been undertaken by the United States, and not just the rhetoric, then we see that besides the refusal to follow the example of the Soviet Union with regard to ending nuclear tests, the United States -- and more precisely the administration -- is making an attempt to set a new record in increasing military expenditure, forming a military budget of the order of $320 billion. True, it has to be said that the budget was, in fact, rejected in the House of Representatives by an absolutely mad majority -- only 12 votes were cast in favor of this military budget, which was put forward by the administration. These are two fairly massive items.

The third thing worth noting is the way in which the United States is acting with regard to regional conflicts. As we know, in literally every direction the United States is trying to exert the pressure of force in order to achieve a rerun of all these regional conflicts in its own way. Then unfriendly actions are being taken against the Soviet Union -- I would not call them pin-pricks -- actions like, say, the statement on the need for the Soviet Union to sharply restrict the number of our diplomatic workers at the UN headquarters in New York.

[Bovin] Concretely, this matter has three groups: There are representatives of the Soviet Union, the Ukraine, and Belorussia; working there altogether are 175 people...

[Levin, interrupting] Two hundred and seven...

[Bovin] Two hundred and seventy-five people, right, excuse me. And the United States is proposing to take away 105 of them over a 2-year period, saying that there are too many. It is amusing to hear all this coming from them, because it is we who are working there, and we who have to determine whether they are needed or not, and how many people we need. Of course this is an impolite act, a hostile initiative directed toward the Soviet Union in general; and before a summit meeting it seems quite strange, particularly during the preparation period.

[Shishlin] Yes, and the statement by the Soviet UN Association, directs attention, legitimately directed attention at the choice of the time for taking this action. It seems to me that the following question is not being asked idly by people concerned with foreign policy problems: Does not everything that we witness in the scheme of U.S. policy signify a certain departure, a recoiling, on the part of the United States from the spirit of Geneva, from those accords [dogovorennosti] of a, well, quite general character, which were arrived at during the first Soviet-U.S. summit meeting? This is a more than serious question.

[Levin] I have the impression that the Americans are inclined to create the impression that they very much want the meeting, but in actual fact they really, in a way, do not show genuine interest. Let us take two aspects: The question is always being raised in the United States of the time for a meeting to take place. One high-ranking representative of the administration will speak, then another; then recently Reagan himself joined in the game: He says, well, all right, if June and July are of no use, maybe December. But underneath all these conversations the essence of the problem gets further away. Let us take Reagan's most recent proposal concerning ending nuclear tests: More properly it does not concern ending them. Reagan made a loud-mouthed declaration that he had proposed that the Soviet Union conclude an agreement [soglasheniye] on a new system for observing nuclear explosions.

[Bovin, interrupting] This logic is quite the wrong way round: We propose reaching agreement on control in order that nuclear tests not be carried out. And Reagan [Bovin chuckles slightly] proposes reaching agreement on the control of conducting nuclear tests. There you have, properly speaking, the fundamental difference between the two approaches.

[Levin] Quite right. But conducting nuclear tests does not diminish the acuteness of the problem; if nuclear explosions are to continue then that means the improvement [sovershenstvovaniye] of nuclear weapons will continue; that means the threat is not reduced, is not removed.

[Shishlin] And here, Viktor Nikolayevich, it seems to me that U.S. political circles do not, in my opinion, accurately read the Soviet Union's intentions or their own interests. What do I mean? I would like to say with all clarity: The Soviet Union has an interest in a new Soviet-U.S. summit meeting, but its interest in this meeting is in no way greater than that of the United States of America. The interest is absolutely equal. While at the 27th party congress and in the program documents which were adopted by the congress, in the party Central Committee Political Report, and in practical conclusions, a new approach is affirmed toward international relations. In this approach we are really striving for equal security for all states, great, medium-sized and small -- at the same time, in the actions of the United States, as before, there is a blind trust in strength in the hope of outplaying its opponent in a nuclear age who has at his disposal at least equivalent capabilities for causing what is called unacceptable damage. And this is of course a cardinal question: Here we cannot build such illusions that this new approach, this new way of thinking, this new philosophy, if you like, in international relations, can be asserted of itself, as if by the wave of a magic wand and that everyone will be illumined with the light of truth [istina]. No, unfortunately this will not happen. But surely elementary honesty, elementary restraint, elementary common sense, these must surely induce the United States -- and not just the United States, but its partners too -- to assess this situation in a new way and not let slip these really unique chances which are present in the political situation in 1986 in order to implement practical steps on limiting and rolling back the arms race.

[Bovin] I am troubled by yet another circumstance: When you look now at domestic political life in America -- well, of course I am exaggerating -- but there is a kind of element of, perhaps, a return to McCarthyism that can be observed there, especially in connection with Nicaragua. Just now, when Reagan is asking Congress for $100 million -- that is $70 million for military aid, and $30 million for so-called humanitarian aid for the contras, the Congress, for understandable reasons, is wavering quite a bit on this matter. It is not yet clear what decision will be made and Reagan is kicking up a great fuss, trying by hook or by crook to persuade the Congress to agree with him. But the key in which this dialogue is now being conducted is reminiscent of the epoch of McCarthyism, because the question is put thus: Who does not support Reagan's proposal is a supporter of the communists, is not an American patriot, acts against the interests of the United Sates -- that is how questions were put when there was the witch hunt under Senator McCarthy.

And it must be said that this is provoking a reaction in the other direction, because very many senators and congressmen are simply alarmed at this kind of impertinent, high-handed kind of unceremonious pressure which Shultz, Reagan, Weinberger, and all sorts of small fry from the White House come out with.

I have not seen this kind of mass pressure in recent years; I have not seen anything to compare with this kind of pressure that is now happening in connection with Nicaragua. You could drive a horse and coach through the gaps in what Reagan says on Nicaragua. Generally there is the impression that Nicaraguan paratroopers are about to land in Washington tomorrow or the day after, capture the White House, and that will be the end for America. A complete catastrophe: This is the kind of feeling that arises out of what is being said there.

[Levin] Aleksandr Yevgeniyevich, I want to illustrate your thought with the words of Senator Edward Kennedy, a highly influential figure on the U.S. political horizon. Regarding pressure in connection with Nicaragua, in connection with granting a loan as aid to the Nicaraguan contras, he says directly: The champions of bankrupt policy always attempt to put in doubt the patriotism of those who are against such a policy. This is a direct answer to Reagan. And how is this perceived, say, in Western Europe? Well, Marion Donhoff publisher of the weekly DIE ZEIT writes that what is observed now in the United States is a kind of unbridled uplift -- she calls it energy -- and beyond this energy can be seen nationalism...

[Bovin, interrupting] Chauvinism, even.

[Levin] Chauvinism. She also writes that as a result, appearing is a kind of euphoric nationalism, for example, that was manifested in all its glory at the Los Angeles Olympic Games. We are again fully armed, and nobody can do anything to us: Such slogans, Donhoff writes, are expressed in the movies "Rambo," "Rocky IV" and "Red Dawn."

[Bovin] Yes, such a motif, so to speak, of permitting everything, and of such a supremacy is very noticeable in American political talk just now -- mostly in their speeches -- but after all the politics are left the words and deeds. And what is being said in Washington, of course, not only damages the political atmosphere but is indeed a serious obstacle for any kind of normal development of events, for any attempt to understand each other, or to move further along the path that existed in Geneva. I have the impression that the United States is shifting -- as Nikolay Vladimirovich said -- away from this path onto some totally different path, a dangerous path.

[Shishlin] This, Aleksandr Yevgeniyevich, is characteristic. You remember, before Geneva U.S. President Reagan addressed the UN General Assembly and talked there about the enormous importance of overcoming these regional conflict situations; he kept bringing to the fore on this account all manner of highly contentious proposals. However, nobody denies that regional conflicts are clouding the international situation in the most serious way. And yet as far as regional conflicts are concerned, the first norm is of noninterference in the internal affairs of other states. The United States tramples over this norm. It is not simply violating it, it is trampling over it, it is not taking it into consideration.

[Bovin] And then there is the phrase: elimination of conflicts. After all, it is also necessary to think what it means. From the viewpoint of Reagan, say, the elimination of the conflict in Nicaragua means victory for the contras. The elimination of the conflict in Afghanistan means that the dushmans capture Kabul and establish their power there.

[Shishlin] Well, yes.

[Bovin] And the same for Savimbi in Angola. This is what the elimination of conflict represents from Reagan's view point.

[Shishlin] Yes, a kind of Grenada version.

[Levin] In the United States they even talk about Reagan's doctrine, and they call the removal of dictator Duvalier in Haiti a pattern for the implementation of Reagan's doctrine. It has allegedly been possible to bypass the leftists, they say, and after removing Duvalier, to put in they own people. But in the first place, the Haitians themselves have, as it is possible to judge from the reports coming from this long-suffering country, a completely different point of view and they insist that people directly connected with the Duvalier regime leave, so that there will be a true, genuine democratization. But the Americans in their egoistic interests very much want the preservation, as they say, of Duvalierism without Duvalier. The very same U.S. policy can be seen also in the Philippines. The main thing for them is to provide themselves with a base. Everything has been aimed and directed at this. That is, U.S. interests, crudely speaking, tower over everything, and this the essence of Reagan's doctrine as I understand it.

[Shishlin] On the whole the United States has, of course, many troubles with its policy in relation to the developing world, such as you recalled about Haiti — and it has indeed been a torture chamber, one of the darkest torture chambers in the Caribbean basin — and what has been done in the Philippines: All this, on the whole, is not only a consequence of some kind of nationalist phenomena but is a consequence of this neocolonialist course being carried out by the United States. It has now announced a line of neoglobalism, and at the same time all this is wrapped up in sufficiently neat words, and it portrays this matter in such a way that the policy of neoglobalism, on its own, is supposedly aimed at asserting freedom and democracy everywhere. It does assert freedom and democracy everywhere: In Grenada it claims freedom and democracy, and for those who are murdering peaceful inhabitants in Nicaragua and exerting unparalleled power pressure upon this independent, small and sovereign state. It is of course exerting influence upon the situation which has now risen in Angola and is attempting to turn it its way; and they are exerting influence also in the context of broad world politics.

What does this mean? In the context of broad world politics it cannot but impose the darkest kind of imprint. We are for trust, for a breakthrough leading to an accord, for resolving the truly cardinal issues connected above all with the issue of international security and the radical improvement of international relations. A policy directed toward overcoming these conflict situations, toward extinguishing hot spots, can and must be an important element, an important link in the radical improvement of the international political climate.

[Bovin] The United States very often talks about its vital interests, that its policy provides the defense of its vital interests. It has interests everywhere — in Central and South America, naturally everywhere — in Africa, everywhere. But for some reason it forgets that the Soviet Union also has its vital interests. If we are to talk seriously and if we are to talk on an equal basis, then any kind of an accord presupposes a mutual account of lawful interests of each other. But the U.S. forgets this aspect; it thinks not of the interests of others, only its own.

[Shishlin] As a matter of fact, I am returning now to the ideas of the 27th CPSU Congress. I want to say that the address to the whole world, of the proposals put forth by the Soviet Union, judging by the response to the congress — and this is of course reaction on different levels — well, this address can be heard in all corners of the world. As a matter of fact, it seems as if there are now two strata of world politics. We are talking about one stratum, a dramatic and acute one, connected with stormy conflicts, conflicts which are at times very alarming. There is also a kind of latent work, which reflects the objective necessity of mankind to survive.

To survive: this is the very same common interest which is capable of uniting not only people but is capable of uniting also countries and governments of these countries in order to remove the threat of nuclear nightmare from mankind. This work which is being carried out in 1986 by the Soviet Union -- work with which our socialist friends and our socialist allies express their solidarity, work which is finding echo in the developing countries, in the political dialogue being conducted with the developed capitalist countries -- this work makes it possible for us to say that we can be optimists. We are not unreserved optimists, but when standing on a realistic base, it is necessary to see that possibilities for the improvement of the world political climate do exist, and there is of course no doubt about the resolve of the Soviet Union in utilizing these possibilities.

[Levin] I would like to draw the attention of our listeners to the issue of the response -- in the first place in Western Europe, because Europe plays a special role in international politics -- to the position of the United States of America. Now, let us say, in the FRG it is possible to hear quite often a view, which is being expressed in the press, that a struggle for people's hearts and minds, a struggle between East and West, is being carried out. Such an expression as peaceful war is even being used. We are against any kind of war, we are for mutual understanding, we are for finding points of contact. We do not want to chase the United States into some kind of a blind alley so that it will be uncomfortable; we do not wish to pressure it. No. We want to talk on an equal basis talk which would correspond to the interests of both the United States and the Soviet Union, and also to the interests of universal peace. The understanding of the fact that our policy is constructive and active is making itself more and more widely known.

The new edition of the CPSU program confirms with a new strength that the CPSU firmly and steadfastly stands up for Leninist principles of peaceful coexistence between states with different social system.

Comrades, our broadcast finishes. Thank you for your attention. All the best.

U.S. NAVAL SHIP 'VIOLATION' IN CRIMEA PROTESTED

LD180829 Moscow TASS in English 0825 GMT 18 Mar 86

["Protest Note to U.S. Embassy in Moscow" -- TASS item identifier]

[Text] Moscow March 18 TASS -- A protest note was presented to the U.S. Embassy in Moscow over U.S. warships' violation of the state border of the USSR off the southern coast of the Crimea in the Black Sea on March 13.

The embassy's attention was called to the fact that the action was of a demonstrative, defiant nature and pursued clearly provocative aims. The note said it was not the first time that U.S. naval ships deliberately failed to comply with the laws and rules of the USSR concerning the regime of Soviet territorial waters, the inadmissibility of which has been repeatedly pointed out to the U.S. side.

Such violations, the note emphasized, can have serious consequences the responsibility for which will be wholly on the United States.

The Soviet Foreign Ministry demanded that the U.S. side take proper measures to rule out similar provocative actions in future.

U.S.-SOVIET TRADE COUNCIL HEAD REMARKS ON TALKS

LD142021 Moscow TASS in English 1959 GMT 14 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow March 14 TASS -- The president of the U.S.-U.S.S.R. Trade and Economic Council said today that the economic development program adopted by the Soviet Union offered good opportunities for progress in U.S.-Soviet economic cooperation.

Speaking in a TASS interview on the results of his visit to Moscow, James Giffen said the U.S. business community had of late been showing an ever greater interest in broader business contacts with the U.S.S.R. He said that had been borne out by a recent regular meeting of the U.S.-U.S.S.R. trade and economic council in Moscow, which had been attended by a record number of U.S. businessmen.

The number of firms interested in cooperation with Soviet organizations was also on the increase, Giffen said, noting that the number of the councils's U.S. members had in the past six months grown by 15 percent.

Further growth in U.S.-Soviet trade, however, Giffen said, required improvements in the political climate. He stressed that U.S. business quarters interested in brisker business cooperation with the U.S.S.R. should exert efforts to remove the legislative constraints on trade with this country, which existed in the United States, most notably the export controls act and the Jackson-Vanik amendment.

During his visit here Giffen was received by Soviet Foreign Trade Minister Boris Aristov. He also had meetings with senior officials of the bank for foreign trade, the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of the USSR, the Institute of U.S. and Canadian Studies of the Soviet Academy of Sciences, and a number of other departments.

FURTHER REACTION TO UN STAFF CUT DEMAND

Termed 'Unlawful, Illegitimate'

LD170702 Moscow TASS in English 0658 GMT 17 Mar 86

[Text] New York March 17 TASS -- The American Government's demand for cuts in the staffs of the New York-based permanent missions of the USSR, Belorussia, and the Ukraine at the United Nations is unlawful and illegitimate, it runs counter to the existing norms of international law, Vasily Safronchuk, acting permanent representative of the USSR to the United Nations, has declared.

In an interview with the ABC television network, he stressed that the American action violated the 1947 Headquarters Agreement and the 1975 Vienna Convention, and contradicts the legal conclusion of the International Law Commission. Under the conclusion, it is the missions which have the exclusive right to determine their own structure and size.

UN Association Deplores Move

PM151429 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 15 Mar 86 First Edition p 4

[TASS report: "Voice of the Soviet Public"]

[Text] The Soviet UN Association, which unites politicians, public figures, scientists, lawyers, and thousands of citizens of the USSR, has made a statement. It expresses concern at the U.S. Government's recent demand for a cut in the numbers of personnel at the USSR's mission to the United Nations in New York. This act can only be seen as a challenge to the international community of nations and evidence of the U.S. Administration's disregard for the generally accepted civilized norms of behavior in the international arena. The U.S. actions, the document says, are contrary to international law and create additional difficulties to the normal functioning of the United Nations.

Expressing its indignation at the U.S. actions, the statement stresses, the Soviet UN Association supports the demand that the U.S. Government create normal conditions for the work of the missions of UN member-states and renounce actions detrimental to that organization, which was created to assert the ideas of peace and international cooperation.

REACTION CONTINUES TO CONTRA AID CAMPAIGN

IZVESTIYA Article

PM171255 Moscow IZVESTIYA in Russian 15 Mar 86 Morning Edition p 5

[A. Palladin report under the rubric "Following Events": "A Country as a Target"]

[Text] Washington — Suspecting all and sundry of foul play and lack of patriotism, the Reagan administration is trying to foist on its citizens the idea of mass control of their conduct and thoughts by means of "lie detectors." And James Reston believes that America really does need a device capable of detecting attempts to sin against the truth. But in the opinion of the doyen of American commentators it should be used against those who accuse everyone else of lying. That idea was suggested to Reston by the White House's latest slander campaign against the Sandinist revolution.

"The administration believes that it can sell refrigerators to the Eskimos," the venerable journalist writes in this context. "This time, however, it has gone too far: Congress and the press no longer want to trust its fabrications about the Nicaraguan problem."

Reston's indignation is not hard to understand. In striving for a fourfold increase in aid to the "contras" -- its hirelings -- and deliberately whipping up anticommunist hysteria to that end, the White House has recently surpassed itself in terms of demagoguery. The unbridled imagination of its occupants has been painting a picture of a future apocalypse of the threat that 2.8 million Nicaraguans pose to the West's most powerful state -- and one which is armed to the teeth.

The head of the Washington Administration fancies that he sees "a 'Red' tide washing our shores coming from Nicaragua." Presidential speechwriter Patrick Buchanan is worried by even more nightmarish visions. According to Buchanan the Sandinists, having routed the "contras," will "overturn Central America" like a playing card and 20 million refugees will come flooding into the United States with "spies, saboteurs, terrorists, and murderers" infiltrating their ranks.

In urging his fellow countrymen to support his course of escalating the war against Nicaragua "before it is too late," the head of the White House is being consistent in his own way. "Nothing exercises the President so much as the desire to bring democracy to Central America, including Nicaragua," Buchanan attests. The threat posed to Nicaraguans by such "democracy" was described in THE WASHINGTON POST recently by Bill (Gendoll), who took part in previous U.S. aggression against that country.

In 1928 he went to Nicaragua as part of a Marine landing force sent to quell the people's uprising led by Augusto Sandino. "We committed violence, we burned people's homes there," (Gendoll) admitted. The same thing is being repeated in Nicaragua today, THE WASHINGTON POST adds, only now the atrocities are being committed by the "contras" -- which does not prevent the White House from honoring them as "freedom fighters," "spiritual brothers," and the "moral equivalent of the U.S. founding fathers." "The 'contras' military chiefs consist entirely of officers from Somoza's guards, who fought to the very end on the side of the dictatorship" overthrown by the Sandinists. THE NEW YORK TIMES remarks that many of them have been serving the CIA ever since then.

And it is to those cutthroats that the Reagan administration wants to give another $100 million. The paupers' boots have worn thin, the White House laments, their uniforms are threadbare, and every last cartridge has to be counted. Will Congress really leave in the lurch those "freedom fighters" whose only thoughts, apparently, are about forcing the Sandinists to enter into peace talks?! And because the administration itself is filled with the desire to solve the problem amicably, it sent presidential special envoy Philip Habib to Central America for that purpose.

But on the unofficial level administration spokesmen reveal much more of the true intentions toward Nicaragua. Replying to a question from a journalist here who asked recently whether U.S. actions did not betoken a desire to stifle the Sandinist revolution, White House Deputy Press Secretary Larry Speakes said: "To be frank, that is precisely how it is."

Thus all is made clear. The only question is how to carry out what has been planned. The general opinion is that the "contras" are in no condition to carry out a counterrevolution by themselves. Furthermore, with the exception of the White House, everyone here acknowledges that giving $100 million to the "contras" is like applying a poultice to a corpse ("The administration is beating a dead horse," THE PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER writes in this regard.)

Nevertheless the White House, headed by the President himself, is stubbornly insisting on using the carrot and the "big stick" (in THE LOS ANGELES TIMES' expression) to urge Congress to vote on 19 March for a continuation of the bloodshed in Nicaragua.

As always, the Reagan administration's obsession with anticommunism and military adventures prevails to the detriment of the hopes of millions of its fellow countrymen. "Every gun given to the 'contras' dooms a few more old people in America to hunger and cold," Democratic Senator Mark Hatfield says indignantly. Furthermore, the rejection of the principle of peaceful coexistence with a nation that has chosen a different way of life is the same as "replacing international laws by the rule of force," THE NEW YORK TIMES writes, and the adoption of a policy based, according to Congressman Levin, on myth instead of reality both threaten to cause the deaths of young Americans too, since it is driving the United States into direct armed aggression. With good reason the opponents of this course here have come up with the slogan: "Nicaragua is Spanish for Vietnam."

The overthrow of the Sandinist government would be "desirable," William Crowe, chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, said recently. Another U.S. general -- John Galvin, commander, Panama Canal Zone -- urges that the Pentagon as well as the CIA should look after the "contras." "What this means is a group of military advisers," Galvin said, hurriedly trying to reassure his fellow countrymen.

The dirty war against Vietnam also began with "advisers" as far as the United States was concerned.

'Crude Interference'

LD172304 Moscow TASS International Service in Russian 1542 GMT 17 Mar 86

[TASS political observer Nikolay Chigir]

[Text] Moscow, 17 Mar (TASS) -- The debate within the United States in connection with the U.S. Administration's intention to force Congress to approve allocations to the tune of $1 billion in military support for the contra gangs have, as CBS television notes, turned into "one of the dirtiest squabbles on foreign policy matters since the time of the Vietnam war."

In the truly schizophrenic anti-Nicaraguan campaign that has been stirred up recently by the White House aimed at brainwashing Congress and U.S. public opinion, dirt is in abundance. But to be more precise, this whole campaign is an out and out stream of political filth. There are no falsifications, lies, or slander to which the leaders in Washington would not resort for the sake of implementing their mindless idea of reprisals against the Nicaraguan revolution, for the sake of overthrowing the Sandinist government and foisting upon the Nicaragua people a new pro-U.S. regime similar to the Somoza tyranny.

It is quite obvious -- and the U.S. press itself points this out with alarm -- that the U.S. Administration, while striving for congressional approval of new and large allocations to support the contras, is at the same time striving for permission for itself to wage a wide-ranging war against Nicaragua, including the direct participation of U.S. Armed Forces. As Democratic Senator A. Cranston warns, it was precisely this course -- upon which official Washington is embarking today in its aspiration to overthrow the legitimate government of Nicaragua -- that one time led the United States toward tragedy in Vietnam.

The administration's policy is threatening to turn into a "new Vietnam" for the United States, D. Bonior member of the House of Representatives stressed.

But the White House chief, like his whole team, has no wish to listen to the voice of reason. In the name of their neoglobalist pretensions they are prepared not only to shed blood on Nicaraguan soil, but also to fan the fire of war throughout Central America, which is fraught with the most dangerous consequences. In order to justify this interventionist course in the eyes of the United States and the world public they are also resorting to the most absurd fables, a model of which is the latest speech by President Reagan on national television. What horrors the President is using to frighten the Americans! According to Reagan, Nicaragua in particular represents a "lethal threat" to the United States and to the Western Hemisphere in general. I think there is no need to comment on this and the other ridiculous assertions, similar to this one, by the head of such a mighty state as the United States.

The discussion in the Congress about support for the "contras," gangs of killers and men of violence whose backbone is formed by former hangers-on of the Somoza dictatorship, itself represents a most crude interference in the affairs of a sovereign state that is a full member of the United Nations. The Washington Administration, staking on force in its policy regarding Nicaragua, is at the same time undermining all the efforts of Latin America and other states directed toward a peaceful settlement of the Central American crisis, and is trampling the generally accepted norms of international law, the principles of the UN Charter and those of the Organization of American States.

Habib Role Assessed

[Major V. Laptev article: "Dangerous Line"]

[Text] For many years the U.S. President has kept the highly experienced diplomat Philip Habib "to himself," using him as a special envoy to the world's "hot spots." The most recent mission by the master in backstage diplomacy was his trip to the Philippines, where, in Reagan's words, he played a "key" role in defending U.S. interests. What this led to is quite well known.

And now the White House incumbent is sending Habib as his special representative to Central America. To what end? On the one hand, to try to strengthen the shaky U.S. position in the region. To put the newly elected presidents of Costa Rica, Guatemala, and Honduras, who deigned to have their own opinions that differed somewhat from U.S. opinion, in their place and nudge them into confrontation with Nicaragua. On the other hand, Habib is tasked with showing his own Congress that the administration allows the possibility of a "diplomatic solution" to the problems of Central America. Reagan hinted at this when trumpeting the "initiative" of the Salvadoran puppet Duarte, who announced his agreement to start a dialogue with the insurgents on condition that the Nicaraguan Government hold talks with the "contra" ringleaders. These maneuvers hide an attempt to sway members of Congress in favor of allocating $100 million to the gangs of Nicaraguan rebels.

The U.S. Administration is gambling on crudely blackmailing legislators in the spirit of the unforgettable McCarthy. They are being intimidated with the prospect of the "communist earthquake" that could shake Latin America if the Sandinist government is not overthrown and the "threat" that Nicaragua allegedly poses to U.S. national security.

Things have reached the point where Buchanan, director of the White House communications department, stated that if the Democrats vote against allocating aid to the "contras" they are thereby supporting "Daniel Ortega and the communists" and betraying "America's national interests." And Pentagon chief Weinberger has hinted that in such a case U.S. troops would have to be sent into Nicaragua.

However, on Capitol Hill the opposition to the White House's aggressive policy toward Nicaragua remains strong. "We must try to acheive peace through talks involving the interested countries," Senator E. Kennedy has stated. "But the present administration has simply turned its back on talks." There are growing fears that the lifting of restrictions on aid to the "contras" will lead to an additional contingent of U.S. military advisers being sent to Central America and to the open use of means from other sources, such as the CIA emergency fund. According to Congressman M. Barnes, it is a question for all intents and purposes not of $100 million but of a considerably larger sum.

What is the explanation for the feverish haste with which the White House is forcing through new appropriations for its placemen? The Sandinist People's Army's crushing defeats of bandit formations and their demoralization. According to American press reports, three-fourths of the rebels are no longer participating in combat operations in Nicaragua but are languishing in base camps in Honduras. The only thing in which they are successful is looting and killing of peaceful civilians. One of their ringleaders, Robelo cynically told journalists that during "a civil war there are bound to be atrocities."

In an attempt to improve his mercenaries' combat capability Weinberger is pressing for urgent deliveries of big consignments of modern weapons to them. And this means nothing but a further escalation of the undeclared war against Nicaragua. Especially since, as the President himself acknowledges, "administration people" are constantly heading for Somozista bases to direct their activity on the spot.

But what if no success is achieved in overthrowing Daniel Ortega's government at the hands of the "contras" even after the allocation of new appropriations? According to THE NEW YORK TIMES, the administration could then decide on the next insane step -- a "U.S. invasion of Nicaragua."

"It would be a catastrophe for America to slide...into the abyss of gunboat diplomacy," was House Speaker O'Neill's comment on Reagan's proposal for aid to the Somozistas.

Advisers To Train Contras

LD141853 Moscow TASS in English 1816 GMT 14 Mar 86

[Text] Washington March 14 TASS -- The United States is ready to provide military advisers for training Nicaraguan "contras", a high-ranking Pentagon official told the ASSOCIATED PRESS news agency in an interview. In his words, the advisers will teach the "contras" how to handle weapons they would get if the Congress approves the administration's request for 100 million dollars in aid to them.

Somozista bands would like to get modern weapons from Washington, primarily portable anti-aircraft missile systems. It follows from the statement of the Pentagon official, that a group of American military advisers can be sent to Honduras from where the CIA hirelings are known to make raids into Nicaragua. He called for the lifting of all restrictions that prevent the Pentagon and the CIA from giving direct support to the "contras".

The Pentagon also requested five million dollars from the U.S. Congress for the construction of new military bases in Honduras. Over the past three years a ramified network of military bases and airfields that can receive heavy transport planes, was built in Honduras on the initiative of the U.S. Administration under the pretext the "Nicaragua constitutes a threat to Central American countries. [no closing quotation marks as received] Over the same time 10 joint American-Honduran maneuvers were staged in Honduras during which Nicaraguan "contras" also underwent training. At the present time a group of American engineers and technicians is engaged in the construction of yet another major military airfield some 60 kilometers from the border between Honduras and Nicaragua.

The CIA hirelings entrenched in Honduras do not bother to conceal their satisfaction at the U.S. Administration's desire to get more funds for them. The lion's share of the money is for providing military aid to them.

PRAVDA COMMENTATOR ON U.S. AID TO UNITA

PM131853 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 12 Mar 86 First Edition p 5

[Sergey Demidov "Commentator's Column": "Attracting the Terrorist"]

[Text] The terrorists from the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola [UNITA], trained and armed with U.S. and Republic of South Africa money and incited by J. Savimbi, recently committed a new crime. The seized over 150 foreign specialists and Angolans in the city of (Andrada) in northeast Angola. This is an overt act of banditry.

But official circles in Washington, which has recently been so "concerned" for human rights and the struggle against international terrorism, are for some reason in no hurry to raise an outcry over this. Why such restraint? As is well know, in late January and early February Savimbi made his latest tour of the U.S. corridors of power. He undertook his pilgrimage to the banks of the Potomac by no means out of a passion for distant voyages. This political adventurist was seeking substantial financial and military support across the ocean for his piratical deeds. The Washington strategists raised the terrorist on the propaganda shield of a "freedom fighter." That is why, according to President Reagan, the United States would like to be "very useful" to the UNITA men. One can understand why. After all, Savimbi and his bandits are very useful (and Washington does not conceal the fact) for the practical implementation of the new U.S. doctrine of "neoglobalism", which is a kind of "statute" of global state piracy. It is no accident that after the meeting with the ringleader of the splittist grouping the U.S. Government allocated UNITA $15 million from secret CIA funds. That is not all. The reactionary "Heritage Foundation" organization and other "brain trusts" of the present administration are seeking from the White House a fabulous subscription to Savimbi's coffers of at least $500 million.

As a commentary of the racist "Voice of South Africa" radio station noted with satisfaction recently, "new opportunities" for UNITA will rise up under the U.S. "shower of gold." And that is the case. Thanks to the dollar infusions and the agreements reached on deliveries of sophisticated weapons, including air defense and antitank missiles, the opportunities for Savimbi's cutthroats to inflict terror on Angolan soil have grown immeasurably.

In the past 6 weeks the UNITA men have carried out attacks against a number of population centers, cold-bloodedly cutting down civilians, including women, old men, and children. The bandits are now taking the hostages seized in (Andrada) in convoy to an unknown destination.

...Savimbi calls himself nothing less than a "knight fighting for the ideals of democracy." Washington is also now trying to make out he is such a "knight." But no "armor" forged by American yardsticks will conceal the true face of the hired bandits and terrorists fighting their own people.

U.S. MOTIVES FOR INVOLVEMENT IN CHAD VIEWED

LD151439 Moscow Domestic Service in Russian 1030 GMT 15 Mar 86

[Text] The United States is stepping up the scale of its participation in the conflict that is raging, naturally not without its support, in the African Republic of Chad. The U.S. State Department has reported that President Reagan has instructed that the Habre regime be given armaments, munitions, and military equipment worth $10 million from the funds of the U.S. military department. It must be said that the United States is coordinating its activity in giving aid to Ndjamena with France. I shall ask my colleague All-Union Radio foreign policy commentator Pavel Kasparov to speak about this in more detail:

It is no secret that the United States, even before now, has been taking part in the current armed intervention in Chad. However, previously Washington has preferred to use someone else to pull its chestnuts out of the fire, as the saying goes. France held the leading role. It was France which sent the first troop units and combat aircraft to Chad. And emboldened by its help, the head of the present Ndjamena regime, Hissein Habre, embarked on an attack against the positions of the supporters of the Transitional Government of National Unity of Goukouni Oueddei. And as news agencies note, Paris did not limit itself to verbal support; its troops, after consultations with the Pentagon, actively engaged in combat operations on Habre's side.

But now the United States is coming to the fore with its massive deliveries of armaments. Here I will be more specific and note that France previously supplied military equipment to the Habre forces. But this was mainly defensive equipment while the U.S. deliveries envisage providing the Ndjamena regime with powerful attack weapons. Why, you might ask. Well, in order to urge Hissein Habre into undertaking active military actions against the forces of Goukouni Oueddei in order to facilitate the defeat of the latter and to install control by the present pro-Western Ndjamena regime over the whole territory of Chad which is now split in two.

The United States has long wanted to entrench itself in Chad. It is attracted by the very convenient military position of that country in the very center of the African Continent. But of late, to its geostrategic interests have been added considerable economic interests. It has become known that the United States has drafted a whole plan for the exploitation of the oil discovered near Lake Chad. It is also reported that the Continental Oil Company has even received the exclusive rights to further oil prospecting in the country where transatlantic monopolies are already planning to build an oil refinery.

But for all of these plans to become a reality, Washington needs to end as soon as possible the internal conflict in Chad which has been going on for many years. That is why it is adding fuel to the flames of the fratricidal war. The blatant cynicism of this policy of the United States with regard to Chad can be seen. I think, even in the title given to the operation they are conducting there -- Hawk. And indeed one could not think up a more accurate title.

GENERAL DENOUNCES U.S. 'NEOGLOBALISM' POLICY

[Candidate of Military Sciences Major General (Reserve) F. Gontar article under the rubric "United States Is the Citadel of Reaction and Militarism": "The Concept of Force and Shameless Plunder; Aggressive Essence of So-Called Neoglobalism"]

[Text] The CPSU Central Committee Political Report to the 27th congress delivered by M.S. Gorbachev, general secretary of the party Central Committee, states: "The military force on which the United States relies to maintain the status quo, defend the interests of the monopolies and the military-industrial complex, and prevent further progressive transformations in the liberated countries can only complicate the situation and give rise to new conflicts. Money bags can turn into powder kegs."

Such a serious warning is linked in particular with the adoption in the United States of the imperialist concept of so-called neoglobalism. Its openly interventionist content is set forth in the U.S. President's "Agenda for the Future" message to Congress on 6 February this year. Under the cover of false concern about "freedom and democracy everywhere in the world," the White House has made another attempt to prove the "U.S. right" to interfere in other countries' internal affairs, to strive to undermine and remove undesirable regimes, and to give military and other aid to "anticommunist freedom fighters." Washington includes in this latter group the terrorist Somozista gangs operating in Nicaragua, the dushman bandit formations in Afghanistan, the Pol Pot fanatics in Cambodia, the Angolan killers from the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola, and other forces with whose help the United States wages undeclared wars and carries out overt and covert operations against the legitimate governments of independent countries.

The President's message makes no secret of the fact that the "aid for security purposes" given to reactionary antipeople forces is "one of the most effective and cheapest" ways of safeguarding U.S. imperialist interests. The United States has already spent around a billion dollars on waging the undeclared war against democratic Afghanistan. Weapons and military hardware worth 150 million dollars have been supplied to the Nicaraguan counterrevolutionaries. The President insists that Congress approve the allocation of an additional 100 million dollars for the Somozistas, the same amount for the anti-Cambodian gangs,and many millions for secret aid to Savimbi's anti-Angolan terrorist gangs. All this generosity is aimed not at settling regional conflicts but at expanding them. In Washington's opinion this could help the United States to gain a dominant position in various parts of the world. This course was described at the 27th CPSU Congress as a policy of force and shameless plunder of other peoples.

Pentagon chief Weinberger also had his say in the development of the concept of neoglobalism. Speaking at a recent Washington conference devoted to its military aspects, he set forth the "philosophy" of the active utilization of the U.S. Armed Forces on a regional scale. This is termed participation in "low-intensity military conflicts." Weinberger envisages three varieties of interference by the U.S. military machine: against developing countries headed by governments that Washington dislikes (Nicaragua, for instance); in support of reactionary dictatorships toeing the line of U.S. foreign policy (El Salvador, South Korea, and so forth); and in provocative operations against countries that -- so the United States arrogates to itself the right to believe -- harbor terrorist elements that "threaten the security" of U.S. citizens (Iran, Lebanon, Libya, and so forth).

As the Pentagon chief admitted, work is under way in the United States to create special weapons and hardware for various bandit formations and intensive preparations are being carried out for interventionist actions by the U.S. Armed Forces -- particularly the Special Forces and Rapid Deployment Force, which plans to expand to 440,000 people.

One of the most dangerous aspects of the concept of neoglobalism is linked with the U.S. Government's fundamentally fallacious approach to the Soviet Union and its policy. Washington is trying to make out that Soviet policy in the international arena is the cause of regional conflicts. And that agreement with the USSR on cardinal problems is only possible on condition that it change its behavior with regard to "Third World" countries.

These demagogic and false allegations deliberately turn everything upside down. It is well known that the extremely tense situation in a number of regions of the world is the direct result of the U.S. Administration's aggressive imperialist policy. At the same time it tries to use the regional conflicts that it deliberately whips up and exacerbates as a pretext justifying, or so it claims, the lack of progress at the Soviet-U.S. talks on security problems, disarmament, and the prevention of nuclear war. Moreover, foreign observers note, the stepping up of the U.S. propaganda campaign in defense of the concept of neoglobalism is prompted by the desire of the U.S. ruling circles to weaken the impact on the world public of Soviet actions aimed at entirely eliminating nuclear weapons worldwide by the year 2000 and the desire to keep NATO and other allies in their sphere of influence. It is no accident that the President's aforesaid message to Congress reaffirms the administration's course of strengthening the NATO bloc in every possible way and its resolve to continue the deployment of first-strike nuclear means -- medium-range missiles -- in Western Europe.

In order to achieve its global goals Washington is resorting to crude shows of military might. As Shultz admits, since World War II the United States has sent its Armed Forces into the developing countries no less than 185 times in order to resolve situations that allegedly threatened "U.S. political and economic interests." Military maneuvers and exercises have a prime place in the arsenal of fear. As typical examples of strong-arm pressure recently we can cite the "Terrencio-Sierra '86" maneuvers, which rehearsed a possible invasion of Nicaragua by U.S. and Honduran troops, and the "Team Spirit '86" maneuvers in South Korea, in which U.S. and South Korean troops, a major naval grouping including nuclear submarines, and USAF formations took part. This is essentially a rehearsal for an aggressive war in Asia. The provocative actions of the U.S. 6th Fleet off the Libyan coast are also exceptionally dangerous in nature.

The course of whipping up regional military conflicts arouses justifiable alarm among sober-minded Americans. P. (Kornblo), a staffer at Washington's Institute for Policy Studies, writes in NEWSDAY: "U.S. attempts... to view intervention as the foundation of foreign policy are dangerous. This course is fraught with the danger of the United States being drawn into a Vietnam-style conflict, and not just in one country but in several countries simultaneously."

The U.S. system of bases plays a prominent role in supporting the concept of "new globalism." There are more than 340 main air force, naval, and ground force bases and over 1,100 various military centers located in all the strategically important regions of the world. More than 500,000 U.S. servicemen are permanently based at them. The U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff state bluntly: "The global nature of U.S. interests requires a U.S. capability to extend its military might to all parts of the world." A recent fact is also worth noting.

Washington essentially made no secret of the fact that its unceremonious interference in the internal affairs of the Philippines in February was dictated by U.S. imperial interests in that country and first and foremost by a desire at all costs to retain the major Pentagon bases there -- Subic Bay and Clark Field. They, like other U.S. bases in other countries, are springboards for preparing aggression against the socialist countries and support points for hostile operations against the liberated countries and for supporting bloody dictatorships in states dependent on the United States. In short, they represent an infrastructure for carrying out the aggressive concept of neoglobalism.

In proclaiming and implementing this concept, Washington is trying to reduce the problems of regional conflicts, which are often provoked by the United States itself, to East-West rivalry. This is again a throwback to imperial thinking, which rejects the peoples' right to independently resolve their own problems. It threatens world peace by ignoring the objective processes of history and vainly attempting to reverse the course of history.

The Soviet Union firmly and consistently advocates the recognition of each people's inalienable right to freedom and independence and to independently choose their path of development and opposes all attempts at imperialist interference. The USSR proceeds on the basis that any regional (local) conflict in the current tense situation is fraught with the danger of escalating into a clash on a major, even global scale. "We advocate," the CPSU Central Committee Political Report to the 27th congress states, "that the collective search for ways of unraveling the conflicts in the Near and Middle East, Central America, southern Africa, and all the planet's trouble spots be stepped up. The interests of universal security persistently require this." One of the indispensable conditions for eliminating seats of military danger is that Washington abandon its neocolonialist policy and its globalist pretensions.

U.S. TEST LAUNCHES 'MINUTEMAN III' ICBM

LD152135 Moscow TASS International Service in Russian 1830 GMT 15 Mar 86

ARTICLE OUTLINES PRC ECONOMIC POSITION

PM171521 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 17 Mar 86 First Edition p 4

[B. Barakhta reply to reader's letter: "China: The New 5-Year Plan"; first two paragraphs are reader's letter]

[Text] The PRC has embarked on fulfillment of a new 5-year plan. Please provide some details.

V. Logvinchuk, Ussuriysk.

Last year was the final year of the Sixth 5-Year Plan for the development of the PRC national economy. According to local official figures, the targets were mainly fulfilled or overfulfilled.

Compared with 1984, the value of gross industrial output increased last year by 18 percent. In 1985 more than 46 million metric tons of steel were smelted, 850 million metric tons of coal and around 125 million metric tons of oil were extracted, and over 407 billion kilowatt-hours of electricity were generated.

The value of gross agricultural output increased by 13 percent last year compared with 1984, the value of actual agricultural production -- not counting rural industry's share -- increased by 3 percent. Because of adverse weather conditions, around 379 million metric tons of grain were harvested last year, according to PRC official data, or 29 million metric tons less than in 1984. There was a 33.7 percent drop in the cotton harvest, with production at more than 4 million metric tons.

During the Sixth 5-Year Plan (1981-1985) 469 large or medium-sized facilities were constructed in the PRC and retooling was completed at more than one-half of the major and medium-sized plants and factories. In the last 5 years labor productivity increased by nearly 10 percent in heavy industry and by 3.4 percent in light industry.

It is reported that in recent years the Chinese working people's material prosperity has markedly improved. In 1980 the average annual pay of workers and employees was 762 yuan; in 1985 it was 1,142 yuan. During that period the peasant's average income rose from 191 to 400 yuan (100 yuan equals R22.99).

Despite the successes, the Beijing press notes, there are still many problems and difficulties in the PRC economy. They are, RENMIN RIBAO writes, an unwarrantedly high rate of national economic growth, a tight material resources situation, a foreign trade deficit, and so forth.

During the last 5-year period retail prices increased by nearly 19 percent according to official figures. Some 46 million people found jobs during the 5-year plan, but the unemployment level is nearly 2 percent.

During the Seventh 5-Year Plan (1986-1990) the task is to consolidate and develop the results that have been achieved "on the basis of the general course of building socialism with specifically Chinese features." The intention is that the value of gross industrial and agricultural output will have doubled by 1990 compared with 1980. By the centennial of the PRC's proclamation, that is, by 2049, the plan is to "come close to the level of the world's developed countries."

FURTHER REPORT ON ABRASIMOV TOKYO PRESS CONFERENCE

OW180820 Moscow in Japanese to Japan 1200 GMT 17 Mar 86

[Text] Abrasimov, Soviet ambassador to Japan, held a press conference in Tokyo on 14 March on the 27th CPSU Congress. Radio Moscow Tokyo correspondent Potapov filed the following report:

Attending the press conference were reporters from major Japanese papers, television networks, and radio stations. In his opening remarks, Ambassador Abrasimov stressed the historical significance of the congress and stated that the congress would become a turning point for new prospects in the qualitative development of the USSR. The ambassador then pointed out that the congress was held in an atmosphere of deep analysis of various conditions, both domestic and overseas, for social development in the USSR as well as exchanges of frank and principled views on existing shortcomings and ways to correct them.

The ambassador also stated that various problems, including social policy, improving people's welfare, and consideration for people, were brought up as important issues at the congress and that further application of various domestic principles of socialism to life was highlighted as one of the primary tasks in developing Soviet society. The ambassador then stated that the major objective of Soviet diplomatic strategy is to ensure that the Soviet people have working conditions under everlasting peace; he said that the struggle to maintain and strengthen world peace would continue to be the basic orientation of the CPSU's activities in the international arena.

Touching on the situation in Asia, Ambassador Abrasimov pointed out that Japan could and should play a more active role in resolving various issues concerning security in Asia. Touching further on USSR-Japan relations, the ambassador cited trade statistics between the two countries and noted the great potentials for promoting bilateral trade. Pointing to the USSR's call for expanding exchanges with Japan in various fields, the ambassador stressed that the ball is now in Japan's court.

COMMENTATOR VIEWS TRADE POTENTIAL WITH JAPAN

OW140901 Moscow in Japanese to Japan 1000 GMT 13 Mar 86

[Glukhov commentary: "Long-Term Soviet Economic Strategy and Prospects for Japan-USSR Economic Exchange"]

[Excerpts] A government-level USSR-Japan trade and economic conference was held in Moscow on 11 and 12 March. Moscow radio's economic affairs commentator Glukhov writes as follows about this meeting:

It is very significant that the level of officials attending this conference was upgraded, with the head of the Japanese delegation being Deputy Foreign Minister Reishi Teshima and the leader of the Soviet delegation, Deputy Foreign Trade Minister Manzhulo. We cannot help seeing in this a reflection of the interest of Japanese official and business circles in developing trade and other relations between the Soviet Union and Japan.

The trade volume between the Soviet Union and Japan last year registered a slight increase compared with the year before, but to our regret we have to admit that the rate of increase in our bilateral trade in recent years has drastically decreased from that in the 60's and 70's. There are various reasons for this drop. One of them is the negative effect of several steps taken by the Japanese Governmment under U.S. pressure, such as various U.S.-sponsored sanctions against the Soviet Union and [words indistinct]. Some leading figures within Japanese political circles are trying to link the question of developing (?business ties) with the Soviet Union to certain Soviet political concessions. This move is also having a negative effect on USSR-Japan relations. Incidentally, this way of doing things has no promise of success and is totally unacceptable to us.

Let me enumerate some of the main features of the long-term Soviet economic plan. Underlying this plan is the trend of acceleration permeating all aspects of the Soviet economy, including Soviet external economic activities. The documents of the CPSU congress call attention to the need for further development of international division of labor among all countries, including capitalist states. They point out numerous possibilities for developing relations with Western countries in trade, science and technology, finance, and other areas. At the same time, these documents stress that boycotts and U.S.-sponsored trade embargoes must be resolutely rejected in consideration of the national interests of each nation.

The congress, in its resolution, says that in the present-day world, economic relations can be built only on the basis of equality, trust, and mutual interest. Any attempt to promote sordid political considerations at the cost of trade and economic exchange, in disregard of this dictum, would be tantamount to an attempt to arrest the global process. Historical experience shows that such an attempt is doomed to failure.

In our opinion, some of the concrete themes of the political report and the report on (?main directions) of the Soviet domestic economy point to the possibility of developing USSR-Japan economic cooperation. The fundamental task in our plan is the technical refurbishing of the Soviet economy, as well as the renovation of its material and technical foundations and their qualitative improvement. Needless to say, we will rely, first of all, on our own economic strength and scientific and technical potential in this task, but it must be noted that developing mutually beneficial trade relations with capitalist countries will greatly benefit us as well as our trade partners. This is an important factor which those Japanese businessmen who are interested in developing economic exchanges with the Soviet Union must bear in mind.

There is another important point, and this was touched upon by General Secretary Gorbachev in his Political Report to the congress. He said that the overall economic plan of the Soviet Union will be carried out in conjunction with solving the important question of (?developing) natural resources in Siberia and the Far Eastern part of the Soviet Union. This is a matter of great national significance. First, the plan calls for around-the-clock operation of trains along the entire length of the Baykal-Amur railway line, as well as the launching of extensive economic development projects in areas along this railway line. Under the plan, the production of nonferrous and rare minerals will be increased, and preparations will be made to build metallurgical and industrial bases there. All this will be accompanied by extensive development of the social infrastructure, which is aimed at meeting necessary conditions to ensure fruitful labor and fulfillment in life.

This will be a favorable factor in promoting coastal trade between the Soviet Union and Japan. So, you see, the 5-year plan and the long-term plan for development of the Soviet national economy adopted at the recent CPSU congress provide an inexhaustible opportunity for further expanding economic exchanges between the Soviet Union and Japan, which both enjoy a high economic and technical standard.

The fields that are of interest to both sides are broad in range. Among them is the exchange of traditional goods, including the supply of Soviet fuel and fuel products. Japan is and will be, at least up to the end of this century, one of the major consumers of fuel in the world. Another field is scientific and technological cooperation in electronics, biotechnology, oceanic development, environmental protection, and many others.

Some people in Japan may think that the USSR has nothing to offer in this regard. However, it should be pointed out that such a view is incorrect. To disprove such a view, it suffices to point out that Soviet scholars have made great achievements in their research on Halley's Comet.

It can be expected that with good faith, with the mutual interest, and with concrete measures and efforts, marked development can be achieved in promoting economic cooperation between the USSR and Japan in the coming years.

PRAVDA REPORTS DEMICHEV SPEECH TO INDIAN CONGRESS

PM171551 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 15 Mar 86 Second Edition p 4

[Report by O. Kitsenko, V. Korovikov, and V. Baydashin: "Forum of Indian Communists. Speech by Head of CPSU Delegation"]

[Text] Patna (Bihar state), 14 Mar -- P.N. Demichev, head of the CPSU delegation and candidate member of the CPSU Central Committee Politburo, has addressed the 13th Communist Party of India (CPI), which is in progress here. He conveyed cordial greetings and very best wishes to the congress delegates and, through them, to all Indian Communists from the CPSU Central Committee and the 19 million Soviet Communists.

We regard the opportunity granted us to participate in the work of the 13th CPI Congress as a manifestation of the friendship and solidarity between our parties, the head of the CPSU delegation said. It was with great attention that we heard the CPI National Council report delivered by General Secretary Comrade R. Rao, which summed up the results of your party's activity over the 4 years since the previous CPI congress and determined its tasks for the future. India's Communists have shown and continue to show themselves as an influential national force with deep roots in the life of the working class and the working masses. The analysis of the contemporary international situation contained in Comrade Rao's report is consonant with CPSU positions.

A delegation of your party headed by Comrade Rao participated in the work of the 27th CPSU Congress. In his speech Comrade Rao evaluated that congress as an event of worldwide historic significance. We express heartfelt gratitude to your party for its high appraisal of the Soviet Union's foreign policy and for its support for the idea, put forward by our congress, of an all-embracing international security system and for other Soviet peace initiatives.

P.N. Demichev noted that the 27th CPSU Congress will go down in history as a congress of strategic decisions. The unanimously approved 27th CPSU Congress resolution on the Political Report delivered by Comrade M.S. Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, the new edition of the CPSU Program and the revised text of the CPSU Statutes ratified by the congress, and also the Basic Guidelines for the Economic and Social Development of the USSR for 1986-1990 and the Period Through 2000 are most important documents corresponding to the objective requirements of the contemporary historical period. They confirm our party's loyalty to the great Marxist-Leninist teaching, provide scientifically substantiated answers to fundamental issues of domestic and international life, and arm Communists and all Soviet working people with a clear perspective.

The results of the congress are a continuation and development of the cause of the Great October Revolution, which opened the way to building socialism and to the peoples' struggle against social and national oppression and for lasting peace and universal security. Throughout the work of the congress the Leninist party's innovative, creative approach to the most complex problems of the crucial contemporary stage in history was apparent. The 27th CPSU Congress showed with renewed force that socialism is purposefully and persistently waging the struggle to save all mankind from nuclear catastrophe and acts as a reliable guarantor of peace.

A terrible threat hangs over the world, for which aggressive, militarist imperialist circles are to blame. The Soviet Union's proposals, set out in the Statement bv Comrade M.S. Gorbachev, general, secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, of 15 January this year, are a specific, constructive program ot action aimed at enabling mankind to enter the third millennium having eliminated the nuclear sword of Damocles hanging over it. These Soviet proposals have met with the broadest possible support throughout the world.

It is with regret that we have to state that the Soviet Union's proposals are not meeting with a constructive response on the part of the U.S. Government. President Reagan's reply to the Soviet proposals, which was received on the eve of the 27th CPSU Congress, attests that the United States refuses to discontinue implementation of its plans to prepare for "star wars" and has no wish to follow the example of the Soviet Union in the noble cause of halting nuclear tests. To all appearances, it intends to weaken the peoples' struggle to stop the arms race and eliminate nuclear weapons behind a smokescreen of proclamations about its peaceable aspirations. It is with imperialism, and only with imperialism, that the responsibility rests for unleashing and constantly whipping up the arms race. Imperialism, which was the first to use nuclear weapons, is now preparing to carry the arms race into space and to take aim at the whole world.

Realization of our proposals of 15 January this year is a central aspect of the Soviet Union's foreign policy for the coming years. Its aim is to free the world from the threat of nuclear war, the head of the CPSU delegation noted.

The course of history and social progress increasingly urgently demands constructive, creative collaboration between states and peoples on a world scale.

We count on the solidarity of all peace-loving forces in the implementation of a policy of detente. The powerful counterweight to aggressive imperialist policy represented by the development of the world revolutionary process and of mass democratic and antiwar movements, which expand and increase the vast potential of peace, reason, and good will, is more essential today than ever before.

Cessation of the arms race will make it possible to free vast means which could be channeled into peaceful building and into giving effective aid to peoples struggling to overcome backwardness, starvation, and poverty. In an attempt to impose its domination on those countries liberated from colonial oppression, imperialism has created a sophisticated system of neocolonial exploitation. The 27th CPSU Congress decisively condemned this policy of shameless rapacity, stressing that only cooperation on a fair basis opens the way to progress for all peoples. We believe that a long-topical issue is that of restructuring international economic relations on a fair, democratic basis and establishing a new world economic order free of neocolonialism, discrimination, and pressure.

The problems of ensuring peace and security in Asia and in the Indian and Pacific Oceans, he went on to point out, have now acquired great importance. The essence of our approach lies in uniting the efforts of all Asian states, irrespective of their social systems, in a joint search for a constructive solution. An important role is played by India -- which enjoys deserved prestige as a great peace-loving Asian power and recognized leader of the Nonaligned Movement — in ensuring peace and peaceful cooperation on the Asian Continent. We treat this movement and its aims and goals with understanding and are in favor of enhancing its role in world politics. The USSR has always been and will continue to be on the side of nonaligned states in their struggle against imperialism, neocolonialism, racism, and militarism and to overcome disputes and conflicts through negotiations.

The Soviet Union highly values the contribution made by India and its government headed by Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi to the task of strengthening general peace and international security. We are sincerely interested in seeing India, a country friendly to us, as a strong, flourishing state playing an increasingly substantial role in world affairs.

Soviet-Indian relations, which are based on the Treaty of Peace, Friendship, and Cooperation between our countries, continue to dynamically develop on an upward curve. Soviet-Indian friendship is cemented by the common interests of our countries' peoples in the struggle against imperialism, neocolonialism, and racism. This friendship and cooperation is an important factor of peace and stability in Asia and throughout the world, and the significance of this factor is constantly growing.

P.N. Demichev noted that the Soviet Union is now at a crucial stage in its development. Over the last quarter century the Soviet people have achieved great successes in socialist building. The country's national income has quadrupled, industrial production has quintupled, agricultural production has increased 1.7 times, and the population's real income has grown 2.6 times. The 27th congress adopted a strategy of acceleration, by which our party understands not only an increase in economic growth rates but also the comprehensive intensification of production on the basis of scientific and technical progress, the restructuring of the economy, and the development of effective forms of labor management, organization, and incentives.

The documents approved at the congress determine ways of raising all Soviet society to a qualitatively new level of development. In the next 15 years we must double the total national income and the volume of industrial production. In order to achieve these aims, labor productivity must be increased 2.3-2.5 times and the entire national economy must be set on a course of intensification.

Production intensification under socialist conditions does not engender unemployment or a deterioration in the position of the working masses. On the contrary, the people's prosperity will rise to a qualitatively new level on the basis of this intensification. The population's real income will increase 1.6-1.8 times. The 27th CPSU Congress determined ways of further democratizing Soviet society and increasing the people's socialist self-management. Our party will continue to assist the development of initiative in labor collectives, soviets, trade unions, the Komsomol, creative unions, and voluntary societies. The party program is aimed at using all forms of direct democracy and direct participation by the masses in the development, adoption, and implementation of state and other decisions. As a result of the implementation of plans outlined by the party, the economy and culture of all of our country's nation and nationalities will further develop and the ideological and political unity of Soviet society, as well as the fraternal friendship between the peoples of the USSR, will grow stronger. The Soviet people now represent a qualitatively new social and international community united by their common aims and interests.

The CPSU -- as a component of the international communist movement -- regards its activity to improve socialist society and progress toward communism as an important international task, whose fulfillment is in the interests of the working class and the working people in countries throughout the world, he stressed. The international communist movement has entered a qualitatively new stage of development brought about by profound social changes, the influence of the scientific and technical revolution, and the dynamic development of young independent states. This demands new approaches to understanding present-day realities and further development of Marxist-Leninist teaching. Communist parties must operate under different conditions, and this naturally engenders diversity in the communist movement. But diversity is not a synonym for dislocation. Today as never before we need class solidarity and stronger, equal cooperation in the struggle for common aims and ideals. The communist movement has always been and remains the most consistent force struggling to save mankind from nuclear catastrophe and to solve the problems of contemporary world development in the peoples' interests.

Soviet Communists greatly value the CPI's vigorous actions for peace and against war. The CPI makes a great contribution to the development of Soviet-Indian friendship and cooperation.

We sincerely wish the fraternal CPI and all Indian Communists further success in the struggle for the vital interests of the working people, for the increase of your party's influence among the masses, in the joint efforts of all democratic and national patriotic forces to strengthen the country's national independence, unity, and territorial integrity, and India's development along the path of democracy and social progress.

In conclusion, P.N. Demichev read the text of greeting from the CPSU Central Committee to the 13th CPI Congress, which was warmly received by the congress delegates. He also presented a commemorative gift to the 13th CPI Congress from the CPSU Central Committee -- a carpet featuring a portrait of V.I. Lenin, made by Belorussian craftsmen.

[Text] Mikhail Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, had a conversation with Le Duan, general secretary of the Central Committee of the Communist Part of Vietnam (CPV), on 14 March.

On behalf of the leadership of the CPV Central Committee and all Vietnamese Communists, Le Duan cordially congratulated Mikhail Gorbachev on his election as general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee and wished him great successes in that high post.

Le Duan highly appraised the work of the 27th CPSU Congress and said that the documents adopted by it were of immense importance as an inspiration not only for the Soviet Union, but for all revolutionary and progressive forces of the world. He wished Soviet Communists and all working people success in implementating the tasks set by the congress. Socialist Vietnam wholeheartedly supports the Soviet program of efforts for the elimination of nuclear and chemical weapons, the establishment of a comprehensive system of international security, and countering aggressive schemes of imperialism and reactionary forces.

Le Duan informed Mikhail Gorbachev of the preparation for the Sixth Congress of the CPV, which will set out new landmarks of Vietnam's social and economic development.

Mikhail Gorbachev expressed gratitude to Le Duan for a high assessment of the resolutions adopted by the 27th CPSU Congress. He emphasized the invariable solidarity of the CPSU, of the Soviet people with the Vietnamese Communists, the people of Vietnam, who, closely rallying their ranks, are waging the struggle in defense of the revolutionary gains, for the consolidation of the positions of socialism in Vietnam. The general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee conveyed fraternal greetings to the Communists, to all working people of Vietnam, and wished them to mark with new successes the Sixth CPV Congress.

Key matters in developing Soviet-Vietnamese relations on the basis of the principles of Marxism-Leninism and socialist internationalism and provisions of the treaty of friendship and cooperation between the USSR and the Socialist Republic of Vietnam were touched on during the conversation.

The participants in the conversation resolutely condemned the actions of the imperialist and reactionary circles in Southeast Asia, and confirmed their readiness to promote the quest for ways to settle existing disputes. The Soviet Union vigorously supports the constructive steps of Vietnam, Laos, and Kampuchea aimed at turning Southeast Asia into a zone of peace and stability, at ensuring security in the entire Asian-Pacific region.

The conversation passed in the atmosphere of friendship, cordiality and unity of views on questions discussed.

Shevardnadze Speaks at Dinner

LD172022 Moscow TASS in English 2012 GMT 17 Mar 86

[Text] Warsaw, March 17 TASS -- "The vigorous participation of the Polish People's Republic in the implementation of a concerted line of the fraternal socialist states at achieving a turn for the better in European and world affairs is highly appreciated in the Soviet Union", said Eduard Shevardnadze, member of the Political Bureau of the CPSU Central Committee, USSR foreign minister, on an official friendly visit in the Polish People's Republic. He spoke here today at a dinner given in his honour by Marian Orzechowski, alternate member of the Political Bureau of the Central Committee of the Polish United Workers' Party, foreign minister of the Polish People's Republic.

Eduard Shevardnadze noted that his visit to the Polish People's Republic takes place shortly after the 27th CPSU Congress. I would like to emphasise particularly here today, he said, the following features of fundamental importance from the Political Report of the CPSU Central Committee to the congress.

The dynamism of the economic and political development of the world socialist system now has a greater impact than ever on the destinies of peace and social progress. The forms of cooperation of the Warsaw Treaty member-countries are upgraded and enriched.

The CPSU attaches ever greater importance to lively, extensive communication of citizens of socialist countries. The socialist community can gain a lot from care and respect for each other's experience, its practical implementation.

Peace is the highest class principle of socialism, the congress declared. The struggle against nuclear danger, against the arms race, for safeguarding and consolidating peace has been proclaimed the cardinal direction of the foreign policy strategy of the CPSU.

Having formulated the principle of solving any international problems exclusively by political means on the basis of equality, confidence and universality, Eduard Shevardnadze emphasized, the CPSU has advanced programme directions at achieving these aims. In accordance with them, priority importance in the Soviet Union's entire foreign policy is attahced to the implementation of the programme of the complete elimination of nuclear weapons before the end of the current century advanced in Mikhail Gorbachev's Statement. The historic concept of a world without nuclear arms has been advanced by collective thinking of entire socialist community. It reflects the aspirations of all peaceful people on earth.

Orzechowski Delivers Dinner Speech

LD172125 Moscow TASS in English 2042 GMT 17 Mar 86

[Text] Warsaw, March 17 TASS -- The 27th Congress of the CPSU has been a history-making event not only in the life of the CPSU and of the Soviet state. The congress is of tremendous significance for strengthening and consolidating the states of the socialist community on the basis of the ideas of Marxism-Leninism and socialist internationalism. It has been an important event in the international communist and working class movement. A statement to this effect has been made by Marian Orzechowski, alternate member of the Political Bureau of the Central Committee of the Polish United Workers' Party, Polish foreign minister. He was addressing a dinner given here today in honor of Eduard Shevardnadze, member of the Political Bureau of the CPSU Central Committee, USSR foreign minister, who is currently on an official friendly visit in Poland.

The 27th Congress of the CPSU, Marian Orzechowski said, is of tremendous significance for the socialist states' new peace offensive in the international arena. It has adopted Mikhail Gorbachev's comprehensive plan aimed at preventing the spreading of the arms race into outer space and ridding the world of nuclear weapons by the end of this century.

The main objective of the agreed foreign policy of the Warsaw Treaty member states at present is to preserve peace and return to detent, Marian Orzechowski stressed. Poland will do everything in its power to implement the joint policy. We will as before, act in the interests of strengthening the socialist community, oppose consistently the policy of confrontation, pursued by the USA and its allies, and all attempts, above all in the FRG, to call in question the post-war territorial-political set-up.

We view the strengthening of the alliance and friendship with the USSR as the cornerstone of Poland's foreign policy, as the long-term strategic aim guaranteeing Poland's successful development, her security, the position and role in the socialist community and the world, the Polish foreign minister said.

[Text] Warsaw, March 18 TASS -- Wojciech Jaruzelski, first secretary of the Central Committee of the Polish United Workers' Party, president of the Council of State of the Polish People's Republic, had a meeting here with Eduard Shevardnadze, a member of the Political Bureau of the CPSU Central Committee, minister of foreign affairs of the U.S.S.R., who is now staying in Poland on an official friendly visit at the invitation of the Polish Government.

ROMANIAN, BULGARIAN ENVOYS MEET WITH SHEVARDNADZE

PM171127 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 17 Mar 86 First Edition p 5

[TASS report: "Ambassadors Received"]

[Text] On 15 March, Eduard Shevardnadze, member of the CPSU Central Committee Poli-Politburo and USSR foreign minister, received Dimitur Zhulev, ambassador of the Bulgarian People's Republic to the USSR, and Traian Dudas, ambassador of the Socialist Republic of Romania to the USSR. On the instructions of their governments, they gave him the text of a declaration-appeal "On Creating in the Balkans a Zone Free of Chemical Weapons."

Eduard Shevardnadze emphasized that the Soviet Union thought highly of this Bulgarian and Romanian initiative, which is in keeping with the integrated program for eliminating nuclear and chemical weapons proposed in Mikhail Gorbachev's statement of 15 January and approved at the 27th CPSU Congress. The initiative is in accordance with the well-known proposal of the Warsaw Pact members statement on ridding Europe of chemical weapons. If such a zone is created in the Balkans, the USSR is prepared to respect and guarantee its status if, of course, the United States acts in a similar fashion. The meeting took place in a warm and friendly atmosphere.

FRENCH ELECTIONS RESULT IN UNUSUAL SITUATION

LD171823 Moscow TASS in English 1751 GMT 17 Mar 86

[Text] Paris March 17 TASS -- TASS correspondent Yuriy Lopatin reports: France's Ministry of the Interior and Decntralization has issued the figures on the distribution of 573 seats (out of a total of 577) in the new composition of the National Assembly on the strength of the results of the parliamentary elections held on March 16.

As a result of the polls the ruling Socialist Party lost the absolute majority enjoyed by it in the National Assembly of the previous convocation. It saw the number of its seats going from 284 to 202. This way, French people expressed their negative attitude to the course of austerity measures which has been steered by the Socialist cabinet in the last three years and the failure of its social policy which was manifest in almost three millions of unemployed in the country. Summing up the results of the elections, Lionel Jospin, first secretary of the French Socialist Party, said that from now on the Socialist Party shifts to the status of the opposition party.

The Rally for the Republic and the Union for French Democracy, the main parties of the previous right-wing opposition, will have together with other small bourgeois groupings 291 seats in the National Assembly. This gives them the right to claim for the premiership. The results of the polls show, however, that France does not return to the situation which existed before 1981, that is prior to the victory of the union of left-wing forces. The right-wing bourgeois parties failed to secure a victory as strong, and revenge for the crushing defeat suffered by them at the 1981 elections as conclusive as they hoped for.

The performance by the extreme right from the "National Front," which had not been represented in parliament so far, caused deep alarm among the democratic public. From now on they will have a group of their own in the National Assembly. The "National Front" captured 32 seats as a result of the demagogic campaign based on speculation on the real economic difficulties confronted by the country.

The French Communist Party will have 35 seats in the composition of the National Assembly. Never before has such a large-scale campaign been mounted, a campaign designed to camouflage the true meaning of the voting so as to befuddle the electorate who supported the Communists and distort the stand of the French Communist Party, says a statement on the results of the elections published by the Political Bureau of the French Communist Party.

The Political Bureau of the French Communist Party urged all Communists to work vigorously for rallying all popular forces in the social and political struggle against unemployment, injustice and big business' encroachments on social gains and freedoms.

So, a situation, which is unprecedented in the entire history of the Fifth Republic, has emerged in the higher echelon in France as a result of the elections: from now on President-Socialist Francois Mitterrand, who under the Constitution should remain in his office for over two years, is to deal with hostile right-wing majority in parliament and, apparently, the government of the right-wing parties. In this connection, many political news analysts forecast severe difficulties for the French leadership in the period ahead. They say that in many issues, particularly in the international field, its positions risk to be weakened due to future friction between the president, the government and the parliament.

The first general elections to the regional councils were held simultaneously with the parliamentary elections yesterday. The results of the vote counting in metropolitan France, published here, gave the French Communist Party 170 seats, the Socialist Party -- 495, the Rally for the Republic Party -- 328, the Union for French Democracy -- 346 and the "National Front" -- 130.

FRENCH COMMUNIST PARTY STATEMENT ON ELECTIONS

LD170809 Moscow TASS in English 0805 GMT 17 Mar 86

[Text] Paris March 17 TASS -- The victory by right-wing forces at elections for the French National Assembly and regional councils is a negative phenomenon for the working people and the entire country, says a statement by the Political Bureau of the French Communist Party. Big business will try to exploit the present-day situation to deal new blows to the working people's interests, the statement points out. The Political Bureau of the French Communist Party urged all Communists to strive for rallying the popular forces to combat unemployment, injustice and attacks on social gains and freedoms.

CARLSSON REAFFIRMS PEACE, DISARMAMENT GOALS

[Text] Stockholm, 13 Mar -- Sweden's desire to continue to contribute to the attainment of the goals of peace and disarmament has been reaffirmed by the country's new prime minister, I. Carlsson. Delivering a government statement in the Riksdag (parliament) today, he stressed that Sweden will firmly and consistently pursue the policy of neutrality, which guarantees the country peace and promotes stability in northern Europe. It is necessary, he said, to make every effort to lessen and eliminate the threat of nuclear war. In this connection I. Carlsson expressed the hope that talks between the USSR and the United States will lead to the growth of confidence and the lessening of tension and open the way to disarmament.

The government, he stressed, will continue actively to advocate the creation of a nuclear-free zone in northern Europe and seek broad support for the proposal to create a zone in Central Europe free from battlefield nuclear weapons. It will implement the initiatives in the disarmament sphere put forward by Sweden together with the other countries which signed the Delhi declaration, with a view to freezing existing nuclear arsenals and completely ceasing nuclear tests.

The prime minister noted that Sweden supports the activity of the United Nations to preserve world peace and came out in favor of the successful completion of the work of the Stockholm Conference on Confidence and Security Building Measures and Disarmament in Europe. I. Carlsson submitted to parliament the composition of the new ministerial cabinet. S. Andersson holds the post of foreign minister and R. Carlsson that of defense minister. Then, in accordance with the Constitution, at a special meeting with the participation of the head of state, King Carl XVI Gustaf of Sweden, the change of government took place and the new cabinet began carrying out its duties.

REPERCUSSIONS OF SPAIN'S NATO VOTE VIEWED

PM141121 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 14 Mar 86 First Edition p 5

[Vladimir Chernyshev "Commentator's Column": "After the Referendum"]

[Text] Madrid -- A general referendum was held in Spain on 12 March on the country's membership in NATO (given its nonentry into the bloc's military organization). According to preliminary figures, 52.5 percent of the voters who took part voted "yes." Some 39.8 percent voted "no," and 6.5 percent submitted blank ballot papers.

Arguments about NATO membership have been going on here for a long time, since the moment 4 years ago when the former right-centrist government took Spain into the bloc. The leadership of the Spanish Socialist Workers Party, now the ruling party, was opposed to membership before the 1982 elections. But it gradually changed its view and took a pro-Atlanticist stance in the end.

The Socialist government delayed holding the referendum it had promised until the last moment, until close to the new elections which are due in the fall of this year. It launched a wide propaganda campaign to show that Spain's membership in NATO supposedly "meets its national interests."

The paradox is that the strong anti-American sentiments which exist here were utilized in the pro-NATO campaign. According to recent public opinion polls, even among those who had decided to vote for NATO membership, 80 percent came out in favor of reducing the American military presence in Spain, up to the complete elimination of U.S. military bases here. The point is that the Socialists tried vigorously to show that the refusal to participate in NATO will leave the government no alternative to a one-sided orientation toward the United States.

The campaign to "indoctrinate" the Spanish also involved local pro-Atlanticists, up to and including the directors of the big banks, who threatened financial disorders in the event of withdrawal from the bloc, and the leaders of a number of NATO countries, not to mention the leadership of the aggressive alliance. The results of the referendum were also undoubtedly affected by the actual formulation of the question put to the vote. In essence the voters were asked four questions. This disorientated a considerable proportion of the population. Local right-wing forces also played a flagrantly provocative trick. They called on their followers not to vote at all, hoping that the Socialists' defeat in the referendum would then cause the fall of the present government. As a result, those opponents of NATO membership who feared a government crisis were forced to vote "yes" out of loyalty to the government.

Despite all this, millions of Spaniards came out in favor of the country's withdrawal from NATO. The majority of observers here believe that this fact cannot be disregarded. A significant proportion of the country's population do not agree with Spain's participation even in the political structure of NATO.

ARTICLE ON WESTERN EUROPE SDI 'RACE'

PM131523 Moscow SOVETSKAYA ROSSIYA in Russian 12 Mar 86 First Edition p 5

[M. Kalachev article: "Where the 'Space Track' Leads: The Obstacle Race"]

[Text] It is an unusual sport. In terms of both its nature and its participants. Equally bewildering is its "top prize," of which it can be said in advance that it will bring joy to no one. Or virtually no one.

The race began in March 1983, when the U.S. President made a speech which has entered the history of international politics as the "star wars" speech. Even then no one in the United States thought that America could handle the very complex technologies and economic aspects of the plan on its own. A large measure of responsibility was invested in its NATO allies. And, as is usual with the Americans, this was done without any kind of consultation with them.

Washington at the same time announced a "contest" for its European and non-European allies. And the race was on.

Few of the "runners" wanted to compete in the SDI stakes. But after the administration of stimulants in the form of ultimatums and threats, which is traditional in relations between the United States and its European allies, Western Europe as a whole took up positions on the American "space race track."

Britain was first off the mark. After signing a so-called "memorandum on mutual understanding" at the beginning of December 1985, Britain was the first and to date the only U.S. European ally to conclude an agreement on Strategic Defense Initiative participation at an interstate level. With undisguised satisfaction U.S. Defense Secretary Casper Weinberger stated that "it emphasizes the close nature of the alliance between the two countries and the special nature of our relationship, which is of vital importance for both our countries."

In horseracing parlance, one could say that Bonn and Rome are trailing half a length behind London. The FRG Government has agreed to its country's participation in SDI, but only at the level of private firms. The Italian Government made the same decision literally a few days ago. True, it does not alter the core of the matter, but it does afford the opportunity to talk about independence and boldness.

The main group of participants is a long way behind the leaders: Portugal, the Netherlands, Belgium, and other countries. They are, in a manner of speaking, participating in SDI, but their hearts are not in it. The parliaments do not make recommendations, the governments do not exactly raise objections, private firms are willing but are not champing at the bit either... Naturally, such "decadent liberalism" provokes anger on the Potomac. Of course, the contribution made to SDI by the minor countries of Europe is not going to be crucial, but where is Atlantic solidarity?!

A number of West European countries, despite everything, are rejecting the American invitation to take part in SDI. These include, among others, Sweden and Greece.

Why, then, is Western Europe as a whole taking part in the "space race"? There are several reasons. First, fear of showing allied disloyalty to the United States. Second, Washington pressure. Third, SDI champions in Western Europe ascribe their upsurge to a desire not to lag behind in the high technology of the future, which, allegedly, only "star wars" can give to a fading Europe.

However, the main incentive for taking part in this dangerous program is the ardent desire of West European monopolies to obtain a slice of the immense profits which SDI promises. It is this greed and pursuit of promised millions which spur private capital and the governments of Western Europe that protect its interests to step on to the "star wars" running track.

The CPSU Central Committee Political Report, delivered to the 27th CPSU Congress by Comrade M.S. Gorbachev, says: "We have expressed our attitude toward 'star wars' in sufficient detail. The United States has already embroiled many of its allies in the program. The venture threatens to become irreversible in nature. It is highly imperative that a realistic solution be found before it is too late -- a solution ENSURING THAT THE ARMS RACE IS NOT TRANSFERRED INTO OUTER SPACE. The 'star wars' program must not be allowed to be used either as an incentive to a further arms race or as an impediment to radical disarmament."

This way of thinking -- the only feasible one today -- is winning an ever-increasing number of supporters throughout the world, including Western Europe. The following thought was expressed by the British conservative commentator Peregrine Worsthorne, a man it is difficult to suspect of harboring undue sympathy for the Soviet Union: "On SDI," he wrote in London's SUNDAY TELEGRAPH, "M.S. Gorbachev voices the thoughts of very many Europeans, who are virtually as resolutely set against this project as he."

A race has a point when at its finish the victors can expect the prize for which the whole thing has been organized. The space race competitors also expect a reward. But it is a strange prize: Outer space stuffed with weapons capable at any moment of unleashing a deadly rain upon the earth. The very attempt to implement the program will become an insuperable obstacle to any endeavors to remove the threat of a third world war and mankind's self-destruction.

Thus what we have is a race to set up an obstacle. Does it have any point at all?

USSR, SWITZERLAND NOTE ANNIVERSARY OF TIES

LD172232 Moscow TASS in English 2202 GMT 17 Mar 86

[Text] Moscow March 18 TASS -- The USSR Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Swiss Federal Foreign Affairs Department have exchanged congratulatory telegrams on the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the restoration of diplomatic relations between the two countries.

The telegram from the USSR Ministry of Foreign Affairs says that over the past years Soviet-Swiss relations have been noticeably developed in all fields. Switzerland's permanent neutrality status, which the Soviet Union treats with invariable respect, has contributed in no small measure to stable relations between the two countries. Confidence is expressed that a further strengthening of cooperation between the two states in the spirit of the friendly meeting of Mikhail Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, with president Kurt Furgler of the Swiss Confederation in Geneva in November last year, will accord both with the interests of the peoples of the Soviet Union and Switzerland and the aims of strengthening European and international security.

The telegram from the Swiss Federal Foreign Affairs Department points out that over the peaceful period in Europe since the end of the Second World War Soviet-Swiss relations have been steadily invigorated. The contacts started at various levels have made it possible to establish a useful dialogue, and the bilateral and multilateral agreements between the USSR and Switzerland create a solid foundation for developing relations between the two countries. It is stressed than that Switzerland, which had the honour to host the high representatives of the Soviet Union and the USA in Geneva in November, 1985, thus received an opportunity to strengthen its relations with the Soviet Union. This is a sign of the mutual striving to contribute to stability and harmony of relations in Europe.

PRAVDA Publishes Speeches by Congress Delegates

Moscow Subway Worker

PM041229 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 1 Mar 86 Second Edition p 7

["Speech by Hero of Socialist Labor Comrade A.S. Sukhanov, leader of a team of tunnelers at the Mosmetrostroy's No 8 Administration" (PRAVDA headline) delivered at 28 February morning session of 27th CPSU Congress]

[Text] Comrades: Everyone who knows what collective labor really is, rather than by hearsay, will be very familiar with the good feeling of comradeship. It arises whenever people are led on by a common goal, whenever really like-minded people are working together. That feeling of militant worker unity does not desert me in this hall, where the representatives of our entire party, a party of likeminded Communists, are assembled. (applause)

The CPSU Central Committee's Political Report, delivered by Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev, has made an indelible impression on us all. Clarity and sober calculation, coupled with high-spiritedness and forward thinking, link that document with the hopes and plans of everyone. The whole congress atmosphere and its frank, worker's stance on the main questions of life demonstrate the party's determination to drastically turn matters toward the better and to economically and ideologically ensure the course of speeding up social development.

This policy of our dear party, a policy of peace and creation, is approved and unreservedly supported by the working class, as it is by the entire Soviet people! (applause)

Honest, conscientious work by everyone in his assigned area and a sense of responsibility for his own work is the only way to achieve what is planned. Let us be frank, it was the party Central Committee April Plenum which made us face up to this Leninist norm of life.

Moscow's Communists, like Communists throughout the country, in their precongress discussion of the draft new edition of the CPSU Program and the changes to the statutes expressed the firm conviction that the success of the outlined socioeconomic changes in the country's development is inconceivable without the most stringent exactingness in all things. Eager and purposeful Bolshevist-style discussion about the need be to be exacting toward party and economic cadres at all levels took place at the Moscow city party conference. The capital's Communists are drawing a serious lesson from the past, the need to always be equal to one's duty and to fight for Muscovites' honor and dignity by deeds rather than by words alone.

I, as a worker and party member, am firmly convinced that living up to the party's demands today means constantly nurturing in ourselves and in other people a sense of responsibility for the task in hand and our conduct in everyday life. The work of our section's party group, the team council, and, of course, my own work as team leader are directed toward that end today.

Our team has a good reputation — we completed last year's plan by 7 November and receive good or excellent ratings for all our work.

The changes for the better taking place in labor collectives are being felt in the team and at the workplace more than ever before. The party's demand that the center of educational work be transferred to the primary labor link — the team, where material prosperity is actually generated — is helping to accelerate these changes. Previously, it must be confessed, we gave all our attention to purely production questions and turned a blind eye to people's errors in everyday life. The party's decisions aimed at stepping up the struggle for good discipline and overcoming drunkenness have prompted us to reassess our work with people and to be more exacting in the demands we make on ourselves, with the consequences that the matter has made a turn for the better and the mood in the collective is different.

However, my comrades and I are not on the whole really satisfied with the state of affairs as they are. We have not yet managed to refashion people psychologically or to ensure, as M.S. Gorbachev stressed in his report, rapid progress through a high level of discipline, organization, and responsibility on the part of each individual and the labor collective as a whole for the work results achieved.

For the first time in many years the Administration for the Construction of Tunnels and Subways has failed to meet its socialist pledges. Three new Moscow subway stations were commissioned almost 1 month behind schedule. We feel we have badly let down Muscovites and all the capital's visitors in this respect.

The city party conference pointedly raised the question of shortcomings in Moscow's transport service. The capital's transport lag was also noted in the CPSU Central Committee Politburo's resolution on the results of the Moscow party conference. The question is could we, the subway construction workers, have organized our work in the 5-year plan so as to finish it all on time? Of course, we could have. But we were deficient in quality, the importance of which was particularly particularly noted in the CPSU Central Committee's Political Report: There was a lack of organization, purposefulness, and resolve in our practical actions. I also bear responsibility for this as a USSR Supreme Soviet deputy. Neither the leaders of the Administration for the Construction of Tunnels and Subways nor its chief, Comrade Prostov, showed the necessary organizational abilities.

I will tell you frankly, if we do not achieve a breakthrough and we limit ourselves to half measures in enhancing the role of everyone, it will be difficult for us to cope with the task we have been set in the curret 5-year plan, given the even larger scale and complexity of those tasks.

The Moscow Administration for the Cosntruction of Tunnels and Subways must increase its work output in the new 5-year plan by 40 percent and commission more than 34 km of subway track. Tasks on a large scale, as you can see. However, we have begun the 5-year plan poorly. Because of interrupted supplies of materials and equipment, including cast-iron piping, there was no groundwork prepared. Almost one-third of our program lacks plans and estimates. The plan for the Lyubinsko-Dmitrovskiy line, which was drawn up ahead of schedule, has now been awaiting expert appraisal for more than 1 and 1/2 years. From this lofty rostrum, comrades, I repeat: It has been waiting for more than 1 and 1/2 years! Appeals to Comrade Bevzenko, first deputy minister of railways, on whom the resolution of the question depends, have proven unsuccessful. Where, I ask, Comrade Bevzenko, is your sense of job responsibility? (applause)

Subway construction is a complex task. Carrying it out requires accuracy, good organization, strict adherence to schedule, and a sense of responsibility at all levels — from the planning of work and creation of mechanism through to the organizing of the construction work itself. The actions of planners, clients, and construction workers continue to be uncoordinated. We are also justified in making serious complaints against scientists who are still talking about introducing scientific and technical achievements into subway construction and have not got down to doing it.

Many of us, comrades, will probably remember the feature film "Volunteers," which was about the first Moscow subway construction workers. It vividly showed them working heroically and overcoming difficulties. And it is shameful to relate that today, just like half a century ago, nearly 40 percent of subway workers are engaged in manual labor! Many of them have the same pick in their hands as did the heroes of that old movie, except that it is of worse quality.

The capital's Administration for the Construction of Tunnels and Subways is one of the poorest in the sector so far as the level of labor mechanization is concerned. We still do not have mechanized complexes specially designed for tunneling in our city's difficult geological conditions. True, back in 1981, the Ministry of Heavy Machine Building's Yasinovatskiy machine building plant supplied us with a drilling complex worth R1 million. And this costly machine has lain idle 40 percent of the time on the site owing to a large number of defects. Half of the parts and subassemblies have had to be replaced. Where, I ask, comrade machine builders [sozdateli] is your worker's conscience and sense of responsibility for such pathetic equipment?

On subway construction workers' behalf, I want to support the provision of the CPSU Central Committee's Political Report to the congress on the need to adopt a special law on the quality of output and, I would add, on the need for strict personal responsibility for quality standards. (applause)

I will also venture to say that personal responsibility for assisting construction workers, as in construction itself, has been clearly downgraded. Increasingly blunders in production organization are attributed to "objective" causes of some kind or other. For that reason I appeal today to Comrade Brezhnev, minister of transport construction, to Comrade Afanasev, minister of heavy and transport machine building, and to Comrade Koshelev, chief of the Main Administration for the Construction of Tunnels and Subways: The workers of the Moscow Administration for the Construction of Tunnels and Subways are ready to carry out the tasks confronting them; but our pledges must be backed up and reliable monitoring established in managerial links if we are to work properly, to work as our party demands. (applause) Disorganization and all manner of shortcomings in construction not only lower the efficiency and quality of our work but also its social prestige.

In recent years the status of the occupation of construction worker has been declining. We are certain that the main reason for this is people's dissatisfaction with working conditions on construction sites. Problems of catering and ensuring transport to take workers to the sites have not been solved. Conditions ensuring normal everyday life for construction workers and leisure, cultural recreation, and sports activities for them have not been created. In a word, unless working conditions are radically improved and all the issues in the socioeconomic sphere of construction workers' lives resolved, we will be unable to solve the problem of ensuring cadre stability in the sector. The problem is acute and long standing, and it must be solved in a businesslike way at every level.

Comrades, we Muscovite construction workers clearly appreciate that a sense of responsibility and a committed attitude toward work on our part is the basis of success here. No one but ourselves will make our life better! We regard the policy of our dear Communist Party as a matter of vital concern to us. We are deeply aware that the main support for the party's course is support expressed in deeds.

I want to assure the congress that the Communists, workers, and all working people of Moscow will spare no effort to consistently implement the historic provisions and conclusions of the CPSU Central Committee's Political Report by sustained creative labor and will make a fitting contribution to fulfilling the party's program tasks and the decisions of the 27th congress! (applause)

Maritime Kraykom's Gagarov

PM050955 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 2 Mar 86
Second Edition p 4

["Speech by Comrade D.N. Gagarov, First Secretary of the Maritime CPSU Kraykom" (PRAVDA headline) delivered at 28 February afternoon session of the 27th CPSU Congress]

[Text] Comrades! Throughout these days we have been under the profound impression of the Political Report and the speeches of the congress delegates and guests, the atmosphere of patriotic enthusiasm by which our entire country is living.

The main premises of the report give explicit and clear answers to the complex questions connected with the results of the path the party has travelled, the distribution of forces in the international arena, and the prospects for the country's further development for the forthcoming years and decades. It may confidently be said that the concept of the acceleration of society's socioeconomic and spiritual development, elaborated at the Central Committee April Plenum and approved by the entire people, is standing the test of time and proving its vitality and can be compared with the most profound revolutionary transformations in the history of the Soviet state. And it is no accident that the watchword for these changes has become: Make persistent headway and achieve more! (applause)

Yes, we in the local party committees are beginning to work harder and more strenuously and at a faster pace; but also, frankly, the work is considerably more interesting, and the party Central Committee's trusting and benevolent attitude inspires us and lends us confidence.

Comrades! The Maritime Kray today is the most developed part of the Far East, the focus of the country's fishing industry, a very large transport center, an important industrial, agricultural, scientific, and cultural center for the region. It accounts for 80 percent of maritime freight shipments, and the main ship repair capacities are concentrated here.

Its importance is great in consolidating the economic and defense potential in the east of the Soviet state.

The kray's economy has been developing successfully in recent years: Over the 5-year plan the growth rates for industrial production volumes and labor productivity exceeded the directive targets; about 5 million square meters of housing were commissioned; and the plans for the construction of sociocultural and consumer services and transport enterprises were stably fulfilled.

Proceeding from the tasks set by the April Plenum, the party kraykom is endeavoring to find forms for more effectively influencing people's awareness and behavior. Existing experience of work with the elected party aktiv and labor collectives at sea is being improved.

At the concluding stage of the 5-year plan, we have organized a review of the militancy of the primary party organizations in the traditionally complex — or, to be more precise, chronically backward — sectors of the national economy such as construction, agricultural production, and the light and food industry. At the Communists' suggestion it has now been extended to all the kray's party organizations. During the survey, talks were held with 60 percent of Communists, over 10,000 reports by party members were heard and discussed, and about 1,000 party members expressed the desire to go to work in lagging collectives. At the same time a number of leaders of various ranks who have failed to justify the trust placed in them have been made answerable to the party and some have been dismissed. The practice of competition to replace leading workers, used increasingly widely in the kray, is giving a good account of itself.

Here we also understand, as Comrade Shatalov, who spoke before me, said, that we have so far raised only the topmost, light strata of the problem, while the in-depth, strenuous work lies ahead.

We cannot fail to agree with the report's conclusions that the line of the April Plenum is not being implemented everywhere in a consistent and principled way and that the process of restructuring the style of work is proceeding with difficulties and painfully. We still fail to recognize promptly, to reeducate, and, where necessary, rid ourselves of those who have failed to restructure themselves but have merely adapted and are continuing to live by the principle of outward approval and inner resistance.

Much here depends on ourselves: Often, in speaking of the need for a psychological breakthrough in the awareness of economic leaders, we in the party committees are unable for a long time to overcome inertia or to abandon stagnant phenomena. Many responsible workers in our sectoiral sections sometimes look like "plenipotentiary" representatives of economic organs, lose a sense of perspective, and cannot give a party assessment to leaders for the state of affairs in the sector with due exactingness. Such cases occur in the work of party committees of all levels.

This is one reason for the nonfulfillment of a number of task set by the CPSU Central Committee resolutions for the kray's party organization. They were taken at our insistent request and prepared with our participation, but the kray's party committee has lacked due persistance in fulfilling them unconditionally. This has led to the point where today we continue to obtain about half the stockraising output we consume through state subsidies, and serious losses in construction production have not been eliminated. The effectiveness of Far Eastern science is still low, especially in the development of very important priority avenues of research and their coordination and practical introduction.

Comrades! The Political Report drew attention to the need for the accelerated development of the Far East Region's production forces. These instructions are very important. As a very large economic region, the Far East consists of 28 percent of the country's territory and accounts for one-third of its energy resources and over 40 percent of its fish and marine products catch: for some types of metals and nonmetallic elements, it is the country's main supplier. The Far Easterners' contribution to the gross social product is constantly growing, and by the end of the century it is here that the main increase in the country's extraction of fuel, timber, and nonferrous metals and the generation of electricity will be ensured.

In recent 5-year plans a decline has been noted in the region in the growth rates of production volumes and in particular of labor productivity, and they have dropped below the country's average.

The report noted that formerly, in elaborating and implementing socioeconomic programs, there were often distortions in the direction of technocratic approaches. This has had a particularly painful effect on our region, where for a long time proper attention has not been paid to questions of the qualitative development of the manpower potential with a consideration for the historically conditioned problems of its formation. The development rates of the social infrastructure lag considerably behind the average republican indicators. All this is leading to a high level of population migration.

The existing demographic situation, the strategic position of the region, and the prerequisites for its accelerated economic development require incentives to recruit skilled cadres from other parts of the country and compensation for the difficult natural and climatic conditions of their existence. As yet, comrades, only about 2.5 percent of the country's population is engaged in the business of developing the enormous region's productive forces.

And another problem: The specialization of the industry of the Maritime Kray and indeed of the entire Far East which has taken shape on the basis of the use of natural resources has caused the high level of development of the extractive industries. At the same time, a considerable proportion of raw material is lost during extraction and primary processing: up to 30 percent in nonferrous metallurgy and the same proportion in the timber industry. The supply of modern equipment to introduce waste-free resource-saving manufacturing methods in the Far East could produce a rapid economic effect. We do not have it yet.

Every year hundreds of thousands of tons of tin and lead and zinc concentrate, over half of which is gangue, are shipped from Vladivostok by sea, almost all around the world, to the Black Sea ports, and by rail to the west of the country. For two 5-year plans now the country's Gosplan has been faced with the question of creating a territorial mining and metallurgical complex on the basis of local raw material and in the long term of sea shelf deposits; but so far the question has met with no practical solution.

Comrades! We constantly feel the attention of the Central Committee and Politburo toward the needs of the Far Easterners. The question of benefits was examined recently, and as of next year wages increments are to be introduced for a continuous period of work in the southern regions of the Far East. The party Central Committee leadership has instructed the relevant organs to promptly examine our proposals and prepare a special resolution on developing the production forces of the Far East economic region. With this resolution are linked a considered approach toward the measures which are being elaborated and their subsequent implementation, which will make it possible to duly accelerate the region's development.

I fully support the report's provisions on the further democratization of Soviet society and the maximum use of the broad potential of the supreme and local organs of Soviet power. Enough time has already elapsed since the adoption of the legislative acts on expanding the rights of the local soviets, raising the status of their planning organs, and creating fully empowered Gosplan apparatuses in major regions, but so far there are no marked changes in their work. The executives are not properly answerable for the construction of housing, sociocultural and consumer, and municipal projects on the territories under their jurisdiction. Indeed, how is it possible sometimes to make them fully answerable for this, when their own capital investments are assigned down to the smallest detail by the contracting ministries?

Thus from Moscow, 10,000 km away, the Ministry of Construction in the Far East and Transbaykal Regions indicates the village and street in Maritime Kray in which two-apartment houses or apartment blocks must be constructed and where the club and engineering networks should be.

These documents go to the country's planning and financial organs and are controlled by them, depriving the ispolkoms and the construction subdivisions of their maneuverability, mobility, and, ultimately, responsibility.

It is obviously the ispolkom itself which should handle its capital investments and bear responsibility for their assimilation and the commissioning of projects within normative deadlines. (applause)

The Gosplan and ministries and departments must abandon petty tutelage of the local soviets and direct their efforts toward the solution of fundamental questions. (applause)

Comrades! The peace-loving foreign policy of our party and government generates a sense of pride. Under the conditions of our border Maritime Kray, we can see for ourselves that the Soviet Union's resolute new actions in defense of peace and the speeches of Comrade Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, are meeting with increasing recognition and support abroad.

For us the intrigues of the opponents of the normalization of the international situation are not some abstract concept. The Maritime Kray's people have frequently seen how people abroad say a lot about human rights but in fact not only fail to ensure them for their own citizens but also frequently violate the rights of Soviet citizens. In the past 2 years alone 24 instances have been noted of Western special services trying to persuade individual inhabitants of the kray to betray their motherland and not return to it. Every day up to 100,000 of our seamen, fishermen, and scientists are at sea and visit over 400 ports of 70 states of the world every year. With dignity and honor they bring the truth about our country and about socialism.

We are continuing to strengthen the Maritime Kray's international ties with the SRV, the border provinces of the DPRK, and the PRC, and meetings with the progressive public of Japan are becoming traditional. The kray's party organization pays close attention to the formation of working people's political awareness, the raising of vigilance, and the further intensification of the propaganda of the Soviet way of life.

Comrade delegates! We have important, hard business ahead of us. "But difficulty," Lenin taught us, "is not impracticability. It is important to have confidence in the correct choice of path, and this confidence intensifies a hundredfold our revolutionary energy and revolutionary enthusiasm..." And this confidence, as the course and atmosphere of the congress attests, is in our party and in the Soviet people and it helps us feel and understand the challenge of the era and respond to it worthily. The Maritime Kray's party organization delegation, expressing the opinion of all Communists, supports the proposal to approve the political line and practical activity of the party Central Committee and to approve the new draft of the program and the changes to the CPSU Statute. The Maritime Kray's people will make every effort to honorably fulfill the decisions of the 27th party congress and strengthen still further the socioeconoic, ideological, and defense potential of the kray — a reliable outpost of the Land of the Soviets on its Pacific Ocean frontiers. (applause)

Kharkov Obkom's Mysnichenko

PM051429 Moscow PRAVDA in Russian 3 Mar 86 Second Edition pp 4-5

["Speech by Comrade V.P. Mysnichenko, First Secretary of Kharkov Ukrainian Communist Party Obkom" (PRAVDA headline) delivered at the 1 March session of the 27th CPSU Congress]

[Text] Esteemed comrades! Like all the Soviet people and all progressive mankind, the oblast's working people are following the work of our Leninist party's 27th congress with rapt attention and interest.

The main content, programmatic thrust, and creative drive of the congress' work were determined by the party Central Committee's Political Report, delivered by Mikhail Sergeyevich Gorbachev, general secretary of the CPSU Central Committee.

The CPSU Central Committee's innovative approach to the key problems of domestic and foreign policy and consistency and determination in implementing the Central Committee April (1985) Plenum's course of accelerating the country's socioeconomic development and improving society's moral and psychological climate find undivided support and profound satisfaction among Communists and all working people.

We have every reason to say that at this turning point our party, the Central Committee, and its Politburo are showing what Lenin called a flexibility of mind and boldness in breaking the familiar molds and resolutely disposing of everything which is old-fashioned, has outlived its usefulness and hinders our forward movement. (applause)

This Central Committee line requires that each party committee and party organization constantly and criticially analyze its activity, expose omissions, and clearly determine the most effective ways of carrying out the tasks set by the party. That was the approach adopted at report and election meetings and conferences in the oblast party organization.

Quite a lot was done in the oblast, as throughout the country, in the years of the now-ended 5-year plan. The entire increase in industrial production amounting to R7.5 billion in comparison with the 10th 5-Year Plan was achieved by increasing labor productivity with a slight increase in the consumption of material, fuel, and energy resources. Improvements were noticed in the agro-industrial complex, construction production, science, and the services sphere.

A faster pace of work was achieved last year and at the beginning of this year. But these are only the first steps. Our omissions and shortcomings are highlighted even more strongly against the background of the party's contemporary requirements. The oblast party organization displays a healthy dissatisfaction with the results achieved.

The CPSU Central Committee's resolution in 1985 on the report of the Kharkov party gorkom has greatly influenced all our activity. It helped us to see the existing shortcomings more clearly, establish the main avenues for eliminating them, and raise the standard of all party work.

Reviewing our position on cadre work in light of the Central Committee April (1985) Plenum's demands, we have seen that we still have quite a few economic, party, and soviet leaders who pay lip service to the need for restructuring but who in practice are not ready to work in the new way, to master qualitatively new factors of growth, or to move toward production intensification on the basis of thorough professional knowledge. We train such leaders and set them on the right track; but those who cannot cope with the new, more complex tasks and who have lost their sense of confidence are transferred to a less responsible area of work.

Here we take our lead from the party Central Committee, which resolutely sets its course toward strengthening all leadership links with mature, creative, and moral people who are capable of working as the present period of fundamental change demands. (applause)

It is well known that a clear definition of the main areas of action is one of the most important conditions for ensuring successful work. Mindful of this great role and the responsibility placed on Kharkov's science and production potential in the retooling of many leading sectors, the oblast party organization strives persistently for the practical implementation of the party's guidelines. On the one hand, these guidelines are aimed at the rapid retooling of our enterprises to a modern technological standard; on the other hand, they are aimed at significantly increasing the quality and competitiveness of current output.
